PUBLISHERS' NOTE ON THE COMPLETED WORK

WITH the publication of the Atlas which is incorporated in the present edition The Century Dictionary and Cyclopaedia has been brought to completion. As the Cyclopaedia of Names grew out of the Dictionary and supplemented it on its encyclopedic side, so the Atlas has grown out of the Cyclopaedia, and serves as an extension of its geographical material. Each of these works deals with a different part of the great field of words,—common words and names,—while the three, in their unity, constitute a work of reference which practically covers the whole of that field. The total number of words and names defined or otherwise described in the completed work is about 450,000.

The special features of each of these several parts of the book are described in the Prefaces which will be found in the first, ninth, and tenth volumes. It need only be said that the definitions of the common words of the language are for the most part stated encyclopedically, with a vast amount of technical, historical, and practical information in addition to an unrivaled wealth of purely philological material; that the same encyclopedic method is applied to proper names—names of persons, places, characters in fiction, books—in short, of everything to which a name is given; and that in the Atlas geographical names, and much besides, are exhibited with a completeness and serviceableness seldom equaled. Of The Century Dictionary and Cyclopaedia as a whole, therefore, it may be said that it is in its own field the most complete presentation of human knowledge—scientific, historical, and practical—that exists.

Moreover, the method of distributing this encyclopedic material under a large number of headings, which has been followed throughout, makes each item of this great store of information far more accessible than in works in which a different system is adopted.

The whole represents fifteen years of labor. The first edition of The Century Dictionary was completed in 1891, and that of The Century Cyclopaedia of Names in 1894. During the years that have elapsed since those dates each of these works has been subjected to repeated careful revisions, in order to include the latest information, and the results of this scrutiny are comprised in this edition.

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.

a as in fat, man, pang.
 ā as in fate, mane, dale.
 ū as in far, father, guard.
 ā as in fall, talk, naught.
 ā as in ask, fast, ant.
 ā as in fare, hair, bear.
 m as in met, pen, bless.
 ē as in mete, meet, meat.
 ē as in her, fern, heard.
 i as in pin, it, biscuit.
 ī as in pine, fight, file.

oi as in oil, joint, boy.
 ou as in pound, proud, now.

A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality. See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

ā as in prelate, courage, captain.
 ē as in ablegate, episcopal.
 ō as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat.
 ū as in singular, education.

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u-sound (of but, pun, etc.). See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

ā as in errant, republican.
 ē as in prudent, difference.
 ī as in charity, density.
 ū as in valor, actor, idiot.

ā as in Persia, peninsula.
 ē as in the book.
 ū as in nature, feature.

A mark (◡) under the consonants t, d, s, z indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, sh, zh. Thus:

t as in nature, adventure.
 d as in arduous, education.
 s as in pressure.
 z as in seizure.

u as in tub, son, blood.
 ū as in mute, acute, few (also new, tube, duty: see Preface, pp. ix, x).
 ū as in pull, book, could.
 ū German ū, French u.

th as in thin.
 TH as in then.
 ch as in German ach, Scotch loch.
 ū French nasalizing n, as in ton, en.
 ly (in French words) French liquid (mouillé) l.
 ' denotes a primary, " a secondary accent. (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)

SIGNS.

< read from; i. e., derived from.
 > read whence; i. e., from which is derived.
 + read and; i. e., compounded with, or with suffix.
 = read cognate with; i. e., etymologically parallel with.

✓ read root.
 * read theoretical or alleged; i. e., theoretically assumed, or asserted but unverified, form.
 † read obsolete.

SPECIAL EXPLANATIONS.

A superior figure placed after a title-word indicates that the word so marked is distinct etymologically from other words, following or preceding it, spelled in the same manner and marked with different numbers. Thus:

back¹ (bak), n. The posterior part, etc.
 back¹ (bak), a. Lying or being behind, etc.
 back¹ (bak), v. To furnish with a back, etc.
 back¹ (bak), adv. Behind, etc.
 back²⁺ (bak), n. The earlier form of *bat*².
 back³ (bak), n. A large flat-bottomed boat, etc.

Various abbreviations have been used in the credits to the quotations, as "No." for number, "st." for stanza, "p." for page, "l." for line, ¶ for paragraph, "fol." for folio. The method used in indicating the subdivisions of books will be understood by reference to the following plan:

Section only..... § 5.
 Chapter only xiv.
 Canto only xiv.
 Book only iii.

Book and chapter.....
 Part and chapter.....
 Book and line.....
 Book and page.....
 Act and scene.....
 Chapter and verse.....
 No. and page.....
 Volume and page.....
 Volume and chapter.....
 Part, book, and chapter.....
 Part, canto, and stanza.....
 Chapter and section or ¶.....
 Volume, part, and section or ¶.....
 Book, chapter, and section or ¶.....

Different grammatical phases of the same word are grouped under one head, and distinguished by the Roman numerals I., II., III., etc. This applies to transitive and intransitive uses of the same verb, to adjectives used also as nouns, to nouns used also as adjectives, to adverbs used also as prepositions or conjunctions, etc.

The capitalizing and italicizing of certain or all of the words in a synonym-list indicates that the words so distinguished are discriminated in the text immediately following, or under the title referred to.

The figures by which the synonym-lists are sometimes divided indicate the senses or definitions with which they are connected.

The title-words begin with a small (lower-case) letter, or with a capital, according to usage. When usage differs, in this matter, with the different senses of a word, the abbreviations [cap.] for "capital" and [l. c.] for "lower-case" are used to indicate this variation.

The difference observed in regard to the capitalizing of the second element in zoölogical and botanical terms is in accordance with the existing usage in the two sciences. Thus, in zoölogy, in a scientific name consisting of two words the second of which is derived from a proper name, only the first would be capitalized. But a name of similar derivation in botany would have the second element also capitalized.

The names of zoölogical and botanical classes, orders, families, genera, etc., have been uniformly italicized, in accordance with the present usage of scientific writers.

parative scheme of the letter-forms is as follows:

The sound belonging to the character in Pheician was that of a rough guttural spirant, nearly like the ch in German, or in Scotch loch (marked in this dictionary ch). In the Greek alphabet it was at first the hindred but weakly value of our h, and with this value passed over to Italy, and so continued there; but in Greece it came later to be used as a long z (down to that time long and short e had been written alike ε), the h-sound being indicated by a half h, namely η, afterward reduced to ι and υ, which last then retained the h-value, or that of the "rough breathing," so called, now usually printed h. Our h-sound is called the "aspiration," as being a near approach to pure unmodified breathing, an audible emission of breath before a vowel or semivowel, made, in every case, in the same position of the mouth, organs as that required by the following sound. That is, the h of ha is made in the mouth-position of a, the utterance in the combination changing only from unintonated to intonated breath; that of he is made in the mouth-position of ee; and so with ho, and so on. Thus, the h before each different vowel represents a different product, and h signifies a sort of common surd to all the vowels as sonants; and, being dependent always for its special character upon the following sound, it is very suitably written by the Greeks with a subordinate sign prefixed to the vowel. In English the aspiration occurs before all the vowels, and also before the semivowels w and y, as in whit (that is, whit) and hue (that is, huy), though in these cases some authorities hold that the w- and y-sounds themselves are not uttered, but only the h-sound, this being what it would be if the semivowel were really pronounced. This view may in part depend upon an actual difference of pronunciation, but is more probably an error of apprehension and analysis; certainly, in our ordinary utterance, whit is to hoo-it precisely as whit is to co-it. In older English our h-sound was pronounced also before r and l, as in AS. hring, E. ring, AS. hrim, E. rime; AS. hrof, E. roof, AS. hlaf, E. loaf; AS. hild, E. lid, AS. hichkan, E. laugh, etc.; in other languages it is found also before m and n. The English h in the Teutonic part of the language comes from an original surd guttural, a k, which first became a guttural spirant (= ch in German, or in Scotch loch), and was then further weakened to a mere aspiration. The spirant becomes mere aspiration when its production ceases to be accompanied with a constriction at the top of the throat, causing a rough fricative sound, and so giving a specific character to the utterance. A guttural mute was changed to a spirant also in the interior of many of our words, and was formerly written with h: thus, AS. niht, E. night; but it has long been lost in pronunciation, after being written with gh instead of h (the g never pronounced). The aspiration, indeed, being the weakest and least positive of alphabetic sounds, is especially liable to become silent. The Latin initial h was totally silent in the vernacular forms which emerged as Old French and Italian, and in the earliest Old French, as still in Italian, it does not appear in writing. The earliest Old French words, therefore, having original Latin h, were transferred into Middle English without h, as able, able, cir, onest, onor, onur, oure, ure, etc., through similar Old French forms from Latin habitus, habilis, heres, honestus, honor, hora, etc. In later Old French and Middle English the pedantic habit of imitating the spelling of the original Latin, if known, led to the general restoration of h in these words, a restoration completed in modern French, though the h has remained always unpronounced in English. The h now appears in the modern forms of all the above words, and others (except able and arbor), the restored forms hable, harbor, having died out, namely, unpronounced in heir, honest, honor, hour, etc., and pronounced (by conformity to later words) in habit, heretic, etc., while in some, as herb, humble, etc., the pronunciation wavers between the earlier unspirated form and the later aspirated form. The confusion existing in such cases led to some variation in the spelling of words originally and properly beginning with a vowel, the h, though not pronounced, being often erroneously inserted in writing, as in habundant, habound, habundance, etc., for abundant, abound, abundance, etc. A similar confusion extended to words of Anglo-Saxon or other Teutonic origin, the h being dropped sometimes where it should appear, and, more often, inserted where it should not appear, as hape for ape, his for is, etc. This confusion characterizes the present pronunciation of the London cockney. The habitual omission of h is, however, quite common even in educated speech in certain positions, and even where usually uttered it is apt to be lost after a final consonant in rapid and easy speaking. In the pronouns he, him, her, when unaccented, as they usually are after another word, the h is almost universally omitted in colloquial speech, an omission long recognized in the common spelling of the related neuter pronoun hit, now always written and pronounced it, and in the colloquial plural hem, now written em. The h forms a number of digraphs, or compound characters, some of them of great importance and frequency. The origin of this practice goes back to the earliest Greek period, when the so-called aspirates were real aspirates—that is, mutes with an audible bit of flatus expelled after them: kh nearly as in backhorse, th as in boat-hook, ph as in haphazard. The sounds were at first so written in Greek, with an h after each mute; later, simple characters were devised to take the place of these combinations. But in Greek words carried into Italy the spelling with h was kept up: thus, chorus, theatrum, philosophus; then, in the change of these aspirates to spirants, unitary values were won by the digraphs; and the use of th, especially with spirant value (thin, that), was widely extended to the Teutonic part of our language. The digraph sh comes by alteration of the k of sk to a spirant, and its fusion with the sibilant, making a more palatal sibilant. The origin of our gh (always either silent or pronounced as f), by graphic change from earlier h, has been stated above. (See also under G.) Finally, rh is found in Greek words, as rhetoric, and represents an r with preceding aspiration, as in AS. hring (whence it should properly be written hr, as hw for wh); but the aspiration is always lost in our utterance. For the name of the letter, see atch.

2. As a medieval numeral, 200, and with a dash over it, thus, H, 200,000.—3. As a symbol: (a) In German musical nomenclature, the key, tone, or note elsewhere called B—that is, B natural. (b) In analytic mech., the total energy. (c) In chem., the symbol of hydrogen.

4. As an abbreviation: (a) Hour. (b) Horizontal force—that is, the horizontal component of the earth's magnetic attraction. (c) His or Her, as in H. M. S., His (Her) Majesty's ship or service; E. E. H., His (Her) Royal Highness. (d) In a ship's log-book h indicates had. (e) In orchestral scores and arrangements H indicates horn.

ha¹ (hä), interj. [Also ha; D. G. Sw. Dan. F. Sp. Pg. It., etc., ha, L. ha, a natural utterance, the same as ah (q. v.) with aspiration; its significance depends on the mode of utterance. Repeated, ha ha, ha-ha, AS. D. Sw. OFries., etc., ha ha, L. ha ha, Gr. ä ä, Hind. hā hā, etc., it usually indicates laughter. Cf. hav⁵.] 1. An exclamation denoting surprise, wonder, joy, or other sudden emotion, as suspicion, and also interrogation. Repeated, ha! ha! it expresses either intensified surprise, etc., or laughter.

Interjections? Why, then, some be of laughing, as ha! ha! he!

Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1.

Have you eyes?

Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed,

And batten on this moor? Ha! Have you eyes?

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4.

Who's that? ha!

Some gentle hand, I hope, to bring me comfort.

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, iv. 2.

Ha! how the Laurel, great Apollo's Tree,

And all the Cavern shakes!

Prior, Second Hymn of Callimachus.

2. An involuntary sound marking hesitation in speech, uttered slowly and obscurely, and otherwise represented by er or ur.

ha¹ (hä), n. [ha¹, interj.] 1. An expression of wonder, surprise, or admiration.—2. An expression of hesitancy in speech.

The shrug, the hum, or ha. Shak., W. T., ii. 1.

ha¹ (hä), v. i. [ha¹, interj.: cf. hav⁵, v.] To make the sound ha, expressing hesitation.

The right hon. gentleman . . . is somewhat prone to be prosy. He hums and has, and harks back to matters he has already discussed.

T. W. Higginson, Eng. Statesmen, p. 252.

ha² (hä), n. Same as ha-ha², hav-hav².

ha³ (hä, hä), pron. A dialectal variant of he¹.

ha⁴, ha¹ (hä), n. A Scotch form of hall.

He followed me for seven year

Fræc bour out and fræc ha⁴.

Old song. (Jamieson.)

ha⁵, ha². A contraction of have. [Colloq. or dial.]

For me, sister! ha! you found out a wife for me? ha! you? pray speak, ha! you? Brome, Northern Lass.

And I may have my will, lie neither ha! poore scholler nor souldier about the court. Day, Iles of Gulls (1638).

haaf, haff, haf² (häf, haf), n. [leel, haf = Sw. haf = Norw. Dan. hav, the sea, esp. the high sea, the ocean, = *AS. haef or haf*, in an early Kentish gloss hab, in pl. heaf (once), the sea, = OFries. hef = MLG. haf, the sea, > G. haf, sea, bay, gulf, = MHG. hap, neut., habe, f., the sea, a bay; allied to AS. hæfene, E. haven: see haven.] A deep-sea fishing-ground. [Shetland.]

haaf-boat (häf' böt), n. A boat used for deep-sea fishing. [Shetland.]

haaf-fishing (häf' fish'ing), n. Deep-sea fishing for ling, cod, tusk, etc. [Shetland.]

haak, n. Same as hake².

haar (här), n. [Also har, harr, hair; cf. Sc. har, hore, hare, cold, chill, moist.] A fog; a chill easterly wind accompanied by light fog. [Scotch.]

On looking towards St. Andrews from Leith walk I perceived a dense cloudiness all along the horizon: this I have no doubt was your easterly haar at the very time that we were in brilliant sunshine and were oppressed with heat. Hanna, Chalmers, III. 85.

haardim, n. See hardim.

haarkies (här' kies), n. [G., < haar, = *E. hair*¹, + kies, gravel, pyrites, dim. kiesel, flint, flint-stone, pebble, = AS. ceösel, gravel, E. chesil, q. v.] Same as hair-pyrites.

habberjont, n. An obsolete form of haubergeon.

hab. corp. An abbreviation of habeas corpus.

habeas corpus (hä'bē-as kōr'pus). [So called from the mandatory words in the writ (in Latin), habeas corpus . . . , 'have the body' (of such a one: so, brought into court): habeas, 2d pers. sing. subj. (with impv. force) of habere, have; corpus, body: see habit, have, and corpus, corse.] In law, a writ issued by a judge or court, requiring the body of a person to be brought before the judge or into the court; specifically, such a writ (entitled in full habeas corpus subjudiciando) requiring the body of a person restrained of liberty to be brought before the judge or into court, that the lawfulness of the restraint may be investigated and determined. The right to freedom from restraint without regular legal process, which had always existed at common law, was affirmed by Magna Charta; but arbitrary imprisonment was practised by despotic kings and compliant courts till the latter part of the reign of Charles I., and still occasionally till the passage of the Habeas Corpus Act (which see, below) in that of Charles II. The right to the writ in special cases can still be suspended by legislative authority, both in Great Britain and in the United States, in a time of war or great public danger.

The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

Constitution of U. S., Art. I, § 9.

It was considered a duty to authorize the Commanding-General, in proper cases, according to his discretion, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, or, in other words, to arrest and detain, without resort to the ordinary processes and forms of law, such individuals as he might deem dangerous to the public safety.

Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 143.

Habeas Corpus Act, an English statute of 1679 (31 Car. II. c. 2) regulating the issue and return of writs of habeas corpus and proceedings thereon, the right to which had been previously conceded by the Petition of Right (3 Car. I. c. 2) and the statute of 1640 (16 Car. I. c. 10). There are also statutes of the United States and of the several States, generally modeled upon the British act, securing the like remedy and regulating its exercise.—Habeas corpus ad testificandum, a writ used to bring a prisoner into court to testify as a witness: now obsolete.

habeck (hā'bek), n. 1. An implement used in dressing cloth. E. H. Knight.—2. In her., the conventional representation of this implement. It is a two-pronged instrument, and appears, when used as a bearing, in a form nearly like the brace } in printing.

haberdasher (hab'ēr-dash-ēr), n. [Early mod. E. also haberdassher, haberdassher; < ME. haberdassher, haberdassher, habirdassher, haburdassher, found only in the passage quoted from Chaucer, and once, early in the 14th century, in a Latin document; perhaps, through an unrecorded AF. form, with formative -er (E. *-er*2, denoting an agent), < AF. hapertas, a sort of stuff, mentioned once in a legal document, and the supposed source of the collective term, AF. haberdashrie (> E. haberdashery), mentioned along with wool, wadmal, mercery, canvas, felt, fur, etc., as subject to duty (Liber Albus, ed. Riley, pp. 225, 231). The origin of AF. hapertas is unknown; Skeat and others connect it with Ice. hapurtask, defined as "scruta frivola" (Gudmundus Andreæ, 1683; Haldorsen, 1814), i. e. trumpery, ruffraff, supposed by Skeat to have meant orig. 'peddlers' wares, or the contents of a peddler's bag,' < Ice. haprtask, hafrtask, a haversack, < hafr, oats (see *haver*2), + task, a pouch, pocket, = G. tasche, a pouch, pocket, scrip; cf. havresack. But Cleasby, who does not give hapurtask at all, indicates that the Ice. haprtask, hafrtask, haversack, is quite recent, his only reference being a collection of mod. poems published in 1852. The ME. word is more prob. of LG. origin.] 1. A dealer in small wares; specifically, a dealer in small articles of dress and in ribbons, trimmings, thread, pins, needles, etc.

An haberdassher [var. haberdassher, etc.] and a carpenter, A webbe, a deyere, and a tapicer,
And they were clothed alle in oo [one] lyvere,
Of a solempne and a gret fraternite.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 361.

Because these cunning men are like haberdasshers of small wares, it is not amiss to set forth their shop.

Bacon, Essays.

There was a haberdasher's wife of small wit near him, that tailed upon me.

Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 3.

To match this saint there was another,
As busy and perverse a brother,
An haberdasher of small wares
In politics and state affairs.

S. Butler, Hudibras, III. ii. 423.

How use doth breed a habit in a man!

Shak., T. G. of V. v. 4.

Allowing his conclusion that virtues and vices consist in habit, he ought so much the more to have taught the manner of superinducing that habit.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Power or ability in man of doing any thing, when it has been acquired by frequent doing the same thing, . . . we name habit. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxii. 10.

Habit . . . comprehends a disposition and something supervening on a disposition. The disposition, which at first was a feebleness tendency, becomes, in the end, by custom—that is, by a frequent repetition of exerted energy—a stronger tendency. Disposition is the rude original, habit is the perfect consummation.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xlii.

By a habit we mean a fixed disposition to do a thing, and a facility in doing it, the result of numerous repetitions of the action. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 102.

After a sufficient number of repetitions . . . an act becomes a habit, i. e., is performed automatically, or without the intervention of effort, and frequently without consciousness. E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 231.

Irving, Washington, II. 96.

The Lower Town market-places, with their calèches and long-bodied French carts, are filled with the habitants twice a week. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 368.

habitat (hab'i-tat), [< L. habitat, 'it dwells' or 'it lives', 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. of habitare, dwell: see habit, v.] 1. It lives or dwells: a Latin word beginning (in New Latin) that part of the description of an animal or a plant which mentions its locality: as, habitat in America septentrionali (it lives or grows in North America). Such statements are usually abbreviated, as Hab. Am. Sept.—2. n. In nat. hist., the area or region where an animal or a plant naturally lives or grows; by extension, place of abode in general; habitation. The complete habitat of a species is its geographical range. Applied, as it commonly is, to an individual or a specimen, it is generally distinguished in botany from the station, which refers to the physical conditions surrounding the plant, such as soil, exposure, and elevation. See station.

The members of that [human] stock, spreading into different habitats, fall under different sets of conditions.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 338.

Things are good for nothing out of their natural habitat.

Lovell, Fireside Travels, p. 8.

Of course a poet must represent his age and habitat.

Stedman, Poets of America, p. 4.

He [Huxley] describes living creatures by structure. The Mosaic writer describes them by habitat.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 618.

habitation (hab-i-tā'shon), n. [< OF. habitation, F. habitation = Pr. Sp. habitacion = Pg. habitação = It. abitazione, < L. habitatio(-n-), a dwelling, < habitare, dwell: see habit, v.] 1. The act of inhabiting, or the state of being inhabited; occupancy.

For want of habitation and repair,

Dissolve to heaps of ruins. Sir J. Denham.

For their shipping is of two sorts, one for saile, another for habitation also. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 437.

It [arson] is an offence against that right of habitation which is acquired by the law of nature as well as by the laws of society. Blackstone, Com., IV. xvi.

2. Place of abode; a settled dwelling; a place or structure constituting an abode, as of men or animals.

It was so thikke of bushes and of thornes and breres that noon wolde haue wende [thought] that ther hadde be [been] eny habitation. Melvin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 517.

As imagination bodies forth

The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen

Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing

A local habitation and a name. Shak., M. N. D., v. 1.

= Syn. 2. Domicile, quarters.

habitor (hab'i-tā-tor), n. [= F. habitateur = Pr. habitaire, habitador = Sp. Pg. habitador = It. abitatore, < L. habitator, < habitare, dwell: see habit, v.] A dweller; an inhabitant.

The longest day in Cancer is longer unto us then that in Capricorn unto the Southern habitor.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 10.

habit-cloth (hab'it-clōth), n. A light broad-cloth especially adapted for women's riding-habits, but often used for other outer garments.

habit-maker (hab'it-mā'kér), n. One who makes habits; specifically, a maker of women's riding-habits.

habit-shirt (hab'it-shert), n. A garment of muslin or similar material worn by women on the neck and shoulders, under the dress, usually having some resemblance to the collar, shirt-bosom, etc., worn by men.

habitual (hā-bit'ū-āl), a. [< F. habituel = Pr. Sp. Pg. habitual = It. abituale, < ML. habitualis (pertaining to a habit or dress), < L. habitus, habit: see habit, n. Cf. habituatus.] 1. Formed or acquired by, or resulting from, habit, frequent use, or custom.

'Tis given out that you are great scholars, and are skilful in the habitual arts, and know their consequences. Marmion, Fine Companion (1633).

Proverbs are habitual to a Nation.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 100.

A habitual action has in its uniform undeviating character, as well as in its want of a distinctly conscious element, a quasi-mechanical character, and so resembles reflex and instinctive actions. Hence, . . . habitual actions are often said to be performed "instinctively" or automatically. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 616.

2. According to or constituting a habit; existing as a habit or a fixed condition; customary; usual; regular: as, the habitual practice of sin; the habitual exercise of forbearance; habitual good or ill health.

Because opinions which are gotten by education, and in length of time are made habitual, cannot be taken away by force, and upon the sudden; they must therefore be taken away also by time and education.

Hobbes, De Corpore Politico, li. 10.

The habitual scowl of her brow was, undeniably, too fierce, at this moment, to pass itself off on the innocent score of near-sightedness. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, viii.

Deepen the habitual mood

Of my existence. Lowell, Fancy's Casuistry.

In Scotland, during early times, cattle-raids were habitual causes of inter-tribal fights.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 418.

What we call a habitual feeling is one which is habitually or customarily called forth in a calm form by a permanent object of the environment, so as to diffuse itself over large tracts of life in a smooth current.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 490.

3. Formed by repeated impressions; rendered permanent by continued causes: as, a habitual color of the skin.—Habitual cognition. See habitual knowledge, under knowledge.—Habitual criminal, knowledge, etc. See the nouns.—Habitual logic. See the extract.

By Objective or Speculative Logic is meant that complement of doctrines of which the science of Logic is made up; by Subjective or Habitual Logic is meant the speculative knowledge of those sciences which any individual (as Socrates, Plato, Aristotle) may possess, and the practical dexterity with which he is able to apply them.

Sir W. Hamilton, Lectures on Logic, iii.

=Syn. Usual, Customary, Habitual; accustomed, wonted, regular, ordinary, every-day. As habit goes beyond custom in its regularity, so habitual goes beyond usual or customary. Indeed, habitual would now hardly be used where it was not meant that the habit was uniform and unbroken or firmly fixed as an element of character: as, habitual indolence. The other words lead up to this: usual, that which occurs much more often than not; customary, that which occurs in the larger part of all the cases. See custom.

I suppose the red Indian lived here in his usual discomfort, and was as restless as his successors, the summer boarders. C. D. Warner, In the Wilderness, vii.

In 1772 Dean Novell was appointed to preach the customary sermon before the House on the anniversary of the Restoration. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iii.

In the past experiences of the race, smiles and gentle tones in those around have been habitual accompaniments of pleasurable feelings.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 520.

habitually (hă-bit'ü-ăl-i), adv. In a habitual manner; by frequent practice or use; as a habit.

Bad habits must undermine good, and often repeated acts make us habitually evil.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 30.

A very large proportion of the population of St. Eustatius were habitually engaged in supplying the Americans with munitions of war. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

habitualness (hă-bit'ü-ăl-nes), n. The state or character of being habitual.

But true perfection . . . consists, as has been shown, in these three things: in the uprightness, the universality, and habitualness of our obedience.

Clarke, Works, II. cxliv.

habituatus (hă-bit'ü-ă-ri), a. [L. habitus (habitus), habit, + -atus. Cf. habitual.] Habitual. Davies.

Too well he knew how difficult a thing it was to invert the course of Nature, especially being confirmed by continuance of practice, and made habituatus by custom.

E. Fennant (?), Hist. Edward II., p. 3.

habituate (hă-bit'ü-ăt), v. t.; pret. and pp. habituated, ppr. habituating. [L. habitus, habit, + -atus.] 1. To accustom; make familiar by habit or customary experience.

A mind long habituated to a certain set of objects insensibly becomes fond of seeing them.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, lxxiii.

The action was more frank and fearless than any I was habituated to indulge in; somehow it pleased her.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, iv.

2. To settle as an inhabitant in a place.

hackney (hak'ni), n. and a. [Now often abbr. hack (see hack⁴); < ME. hakenei, hakkeney, haknay, hakeneay, < AF. hakeneai, hakenei, OF. hacqueue, hacqueuee, hacquenet, and hacquenart, F. hacqueñe (nearly obs.) = Sp. Pg. hacanea, Pg. also acanea, OSP. OPg. facaanea = It. acchina, now abbr. china (ML. hakenēus, hakenetus), cf. MD. hakenei, D. hakkenet, an ambling horse. Cf. OF. haque (also dim. haquet) = Sp. haca, OSP. OPg. faca, a nag, possibly abbr. from the preceding longer forms (cf. E. hack⁴, abbr. from hackney); but the origin and connections of the words are obscure. The Rom. forms suggest a Teut. origin, and may come (through OF.) from MD. The MD. hakenei is explained by Gesner (in Kilian) from MD. hacken, hakken, chop, the alternate lifting and dropping of the horse's feet in ambling, with the accompanying sound, being compared to the alternating movement of a pair of chopping-knives in chopping cabbage or the like. Skeat, overlooking this explanation, suggests the same hacken in a possible sense 'jolt.' The term -neye is not clear.] I. n. 1. A horse kept for riding or driving; a pad; a nag.

Forth he rideth vpon his hackney, Vpon the Keuerys side to hir logging.

Gentrydes (E. E. T. S.), i. 1249.

hæmatologia (hem-a-tō-lō'ji-ā), n. [NL.: see hæmatology.] Same as hæmatology.

hæmatophilina (hem-a-tō-fi-li-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. aiua (-r-), blood, + φίλος, loving.] A group of bats, consisting of the two genera Desmodus and Diphylla, which have a pair of enormous sharp-pointed upper incisors. In Desmodus the cardiac division of the stomach is enormously dilated, being longer than the whole body of the animal, lying coiled up in the abdomen, and serving as a reservoir for the fresh blood with which this veritable vampire gorges itself. The blood-sucking habit is more marked in these bats than in any other Chiroptera. See the generic words.

hæmatopsis (hē-mat'ō-pis), n. [NL., prob. for Hæmatopsis*, < Gr. aiua, blood, + ὄψις, appearance. Cf. Hæmopsis.] A genus of geometrid moths, founded by Hübner (1816), having slender

a, larva; b, pupa; c, eggs; d, imago. (All natural size.)

der palpi, plumose antennæ, the fore wings narrow and much pointed, and a deep ochraceous color, with pink extraradial spots. H. grataria is found from Maine to Texas, feeding in the larval state on plants of the genus Polygonum.

Hæmatopodidæ (hem-a-tō-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hæmatopus (-pod-) + -idæ.] A family of wading birds related to the plovers; the oyster-catchers. They have three toes, and a bill of remarkable shape, somewhat like a woodpecker's. The bill is much longer than the head, contracted, compressed and beveled, and truncated at the end. There is but one genus, Hæmatopus. The family sometimes includes the turnstones (Streptopelia), when the oyster-catchers proper are termed Hæmatopodina. Also Hæmatopodina.

Hæmatopodina (hem-a-tō-pō-di-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hæmatopus (-pod-) + -ina.] The oyster-catchers as a subfamily of Hæmatopodidæ or of Charadriidæ. Also called Hæmatopodina.

Hæmatopus (hē-mat'ō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. aiua (-r-), blood, + πούς = E. foot.] The typical genus of Hæmatopodidæ: so called from the red color of the legs. H. ostrilegus is the common oyster-catcher of Europe; H. palliatus is that of North America. There are others, some of which are partly white, like the two named, while the rest are of somber blackish or foliaceous hues all over, as H. ater. See oyster-catcher, and cut in next column.

hæmatorn (hem-a-tōrn), n. [NL. Hæmatornis.] Blyth's name for a hawk of the genus Hæmatornis (Vigors), the bacha, Falco bacha.

Hæmatornis (hem-a-tōrn'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. aiua (-r-), blood, + ὄρνις, a bird.] 1. A genus of birds of prey, containing such Indian names as the bacha and cheela. N. A. Vigor. Zool. Soc., 1831, p. 170.—2. A genus of passerine birds, the bulbuls: same as Pycnonotus. W. Swainson, 1831.

Hæmatostaphis (hem-a-tos'tā-fis), n. [NL., < Gr. aiua (-r-), blood, + σταφύλη, a dried grape, a raisin.] The name given by Sir J. D. Hooker in 1860 to a monotypic genus of tropical African plants belonging to the natural order Anacardiaceæ, tribe Spondiææ, and characterized by the possession of 3 unguiculate petals and 6 stamens in the fruit an oblong drupe, and pinnate leaves. H. Barteri, is a small tree with twisted branches, small white flowers in elongated axillary panicles, fruit is red, edible, has an acid flavor, and is called phum. The tree inhabits the banks of the Niger.

Hæmatotherma (hem-a-tō-thēr'mā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. aiua (-r-), blood, + θερμός, warm.] Warm-blooded animals, as mammals and birds, collectively considered: one of two divisions of Vertebrata: opposed to Hæmatocrya. R. Owen.

hæmatothermal, a. See hæmatothermal.

Hæmatoxylon (hem-a-tok'si-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. aiua (-r-), blood, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of plants described by Linnaeus in 1753, belonging to the natural order Leguminosæ, suborder Casalpiniææ, of which only one species, H. Campechianum, the logwood-tree, is known; it is a native of Central America and the West Indies, and is important as furnishing the logwood of commerce. Botanically the genus is characterized by its flattened lanceolate pod, splitting through the middle of each valve into two false valves. See logwood.

Hæmatozoa (hem-a-tō-zō'zā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. aiua (-r-), blood, + ζῷον, an animal.] A general name of the minute Entozoa or internal parasites which are found in blood, as the Distoma hæmatobium or Bilharzia hæmobia, and the Hexathyridium venarum or Polystoma sanguicola. The term has no classificatory significance.

hæmatozoan, hæmatozoic. See hæmatozoan, hæmatozoic.

Hæmodipsa (hem-ō-dip'sā), n. [NL., < Gr. aiua, blood, + δίψα, thirst.] A genus of land-leeches. H. ceylonica is an example. See land-leech.

Hæmodoraceæ (hem-ō-dō-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hæmodorum + -aceæ.] A natural order of monocotyledonous petaloid plants, established by Robert Brown in 1810, related to the Bromeliaceæ and Iridææ, and embracing 27 known genera and about 120 species, inhabiting southwestern Australia, southern Africa, central and eastern Asia, and North and South America. The name, as well as the name bloodroot by which some of these plants are known, is derived from the red color yielded by the roots of some of the species.

Hæmodorum (hem-ō-dō-rum), n. [NL., < Gr. aiua, blood, + δορον, gift.] The typical genus of the natural order Hæmodoraceæ, founded by J. E. Smith in 1798, consisting of 17 species, all natives of Australia. They are erect glabrous herbs with equitant leaves, and cymes or heads of small flowers. The fibrous roots are often thickened into tubers. The inflorescence is always glabrous, the ovary nearly free, its cells containing two ovules, and the seeds are peltate.

hæmony (hem'ō-ni), n. [Used only in the passage cited, appar. in reference to Gr. αἷματός, blood-red, < αἷμα, bloody, < αἷμα, blood; or to Gr. αἷμα for δαίμων, δαίμων, knowing, skilful (in allusion to its 'divine effect'). Coleridge fancies here a compound of Gr. aiua, blood, and οἶνος, wine; alluding to the blood of Jesus Christ.] A supposed miraculous plant, described in Milton's "Comus."

A certain shepherd lad . . .
Would . . . show me similes of a thousand names,
Telling their strange and vigorous faculties.
Amongst the rest a small unsightly root,
But of divine effect, he call'd me out;
The leaf was darkish, and had prickles on it,
But in another country, as he said,
Bore a bright golden flower, but not in this soil;

Unknown, and like aspeem'd, and the dull swain
Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon;
And yet more medicinal is it than that moly
That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave;
He call'd it hæmony, and gave it me,
And bade me keep it as of sovran use,
Against all enchantments, mildew blast, or damp,
'Gainst furious apparition. Milton, Comus, l. 638.
"Buckle" is supposed to allude to Christ's crown of thorns, and "bright golden flower" to the fruits of salva-hæmopsis (hē-mop'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. aiua, blood, + ὄψις, appearance.] A genus of leeches, including the horse-leech, H. sanguisorba.

hæmopte (hē-mop'tō-ē), n. [NL., an improper term: see hæmoptysis.] Same as hæmoptysis.

How now, you secret, black, and midnight hags?

Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1.

2. A repulsive, vicious, or malicious old woman.

No, you unnatural hags,

I will have such revenges on you both!

Shak., Lear, ii. 4.

The hag . . . scowled at the fair Jewess with the malignant envy [with] which old age and ugliness, when united with evil conditions, are apt to look upon youth and beauty.

Scott, Ivanhoe, xxiv.

3. A cyclostomous or marsipobranchiate fish, Myxine glutinosa, or glutinous hag, related to the lamprey, type of the family Myxiniidae and sub-order Hyporotreta. See these technical words. The hag resembles an eel in some respects, is a foot or more long, has a cirrhus sucking mouth, a strong palatal tooth, pouched gills, and is parasitic. Also hagfish, slime-eel.

Hag, or Slime-eel (Myxine glutinosa).

4. A white mist; phosphoric light; an appearance of light or fire on horses' manes or men's hair. [Prov. Eng.]

Haggs, says Blount, are said to be made of Sweat, or some other Vapour issuing out of the Head; a not unusual Sight among us when we ride by Night in the Summer-time: They are extinguished like Flames by shaking the Horses' Manes. But I believe rather it is only a Vapour reflecting Light, but fat and sturdy, compacted about the Manes of Horses or Men's Hair.

Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 371, note.

hag¹ (hag), v. t. [< hag¹, n.] To vex; harass; torment.

That makes them in the dark see visions,

And hag themselves with apparitions.

S. Butler, Hudibras.

hag² (hag), n. [A dial. form of haw¹ (< AS. haga), hag² (AS. hege), or hedge (AS. hecg¹*); see haw¹, hag², hedge. Cf. D. haag, a hedge; G. hag, a haw, inclosure, fence, hedge, copse, wood, etc. (see under haw¹). [cap.] A free exposition and illustration of the Hebrew Scriptures; one of the two classes of rabbinical Biblical interpretation forming the Midrash.

This Haggadah or Agadah varies considerably both in nature and form. In its nature it sometimes humours, at other times threatens; it alternately promises and admonishes, persuades and rebukes, encourages and deters. In the end it always consoles, and throughout it instructs and elevates. In form it is legendary, historical, exegetic, didactic, theosophic, epigrammatic; but throughout it is ethical.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 285.

Also written haggada, agada, agadah.

haggadic, hagadic (ha-gä'dik), a. [< Hagadah, hagadah, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Haggadah; characterized by free interpretation and exposition: opposed to halachic, or legal. Also agadic.

Fowler, Worthies, Dorsetshire.

3. A bungler. [Prov. Eng.]

hag-gull (hag'gul), n. The hagden.

hagiarchy (hā'ji-ār-ki), n. [< Gr. hāyos, sacred, holy, devoted to the gods (cf. Skt. yaj, make offering or sacrifice), + archē, rule.] A sacred or sacerdotal government; government by the priests or clergy. Southey.

hagiocracy (hā'ji-ok'ra-si), n. [< Gr. hāyos, sacred, + kratia, < krateō, govern.] Government by priests; sacerdotal dominion or supremacy; a hierarchy.

hagiograph (hā'ji-ō-grāf), n. [< LL. Hagiographa, pl.: see Hagiographa.] A holy writing.

Hagiographa (hā'ji-ō-grā-fā), n. pl. [LL., <
 Gr. hāyōgrapha, neut. pl., < hāyos, sacred, + grāfēō, write.] The Greek name of the last (Hebrew Ketubim or Writings) of the three Jewish divisions of the Old Testament, differently reckoned, but usually comprising the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Ruth, Esther, Chronicles, Canticles, Lamentations, and Ecclesiastes.

The Psalter, to say nothing of other portions of the Hagiographa.

J. H. Newman, Gran. of Assent, p. 114.

hagiographal (hā'ji-ō-grā-fal), a. [< Hagiogra-pha + -al.] Pertaining to or denoting the Hagiographa.

hagiographer (hā'ji-ō-grā-fēr), n. [< hagiogra-phy + -er.] One of the writers of the Hagiographa; a writer of sacred books; a writer of lives of the saints.

Popular tradition handed down a very different impression of Eadgar from that given by the monastic hagiographers.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 307.

hagiographic (hā'ji-ō-grāf'ik), a. [< hagiogra-phy + -ic.] Pertaining to hagiography; relating to the Hagiographa, or to sacred writings.

So far as the Hagiographa is concerned, this celebrated code is not lost; and almost the whole of its Hagiographic readings would be available for the settlement of disputed points in the Massoretic text.

The Academy, Nov. 17, 1888, p. 321.

hagiography (hā'ji-ō-grā-fī), n. [< Gr. hāyos, sacred, LGr. a saint, + -graphia, < grāphō, write:

2. A history or description of the sacred writings.

hagioscope (hā'ji-ō-skōp), n. [< Gr. hāyos, sacred, + skopeō, view.] In medieval arch., an opening in a wall, screen, or barrier of a church, to afford a view of the chief altar to worshippers in the chapels or side aisles; a squint. See squint.

Through the reredos into a little sacristy, from which the prior or his deputy could see through three hagioscopes into the chapel.

Abbeys and Churches (ed. Bonney), p. 262.

hagioscopic (hā'ji-ō-skōp'ik), a. [< hagioscope
 + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a hagioscope or squint; resembling or serving the purpose of a hagioscope: as, a hagioscopic opening.

hagiosemantron (hā'ji-ō-sē-man'tron), n. [<
 Gr. hāyos, sacred, + semantron, a signal, a bell:
 see semantron.] See semantron.

hagiosideron (hā'ji-ō-si-dē'ron), n.; pl. hagio-sidera (-rā). [< Gr. hāyos, sacred, + sidēron, sidēros, iron.] In the Gr. Ch., an iron semantron; a large curved bar of iron struck instead of a bell to summon worshippers to church. In Mohammedan countries bells are not allowed except in certain places by special favor; semantra of wood or iron are used instead. Also written, improperly, hagiosideron.

The iron semantra, called also hagiosidera, . . . are usually iron half-hoops, which yield a sound not unlike that of a gong. They are occasionally found of brass.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 217.

hagister, hagister, hagister (hag'is-tēr), n. [E. dial.
 also hagister; appar. < *hag*¹ + -ster.] The magpie, Pica rustica. Montagu.

The eating of a hagister or pie helpeth one bewitched.

R. Scot, Discovery of Witchcraft, p. 82.

Words which, in northern and midland English at least, have long been obsolete, such as . . . hagister, a magpie.

The Academy, Oct. 6, 1888, p. 215.

haglet, n. An obsolete form of haggle.

haglet, n. See hacklet.

hag-moth (hag'mōth), n. A bombycid moth, Phobetrus pithectum, whose larva has curious hirsute appendages like locks of disheveled hair.

These are fleshy hooks covered with feathery brown hairs, among which are longer black stinging hairs. This larva feeds on a great variety of trees and plants, and transforms to a pupa within a tough spherical cocoon, to which the molted fleshy appendages are attached. The moth is purplish-brown grained with ochreous, with sable hind wings and abdomen.

hag-ridden (hag'rid'n), a. 1. Ridden by hags or witches, as a horse.—2. Afflicted with nightmare. Cheyne.—3. Entangled; involved.
 [Prov. Eng.]

Larva of Hag-moth (Phobetrus pithectum), natural size.

bag seed (hag'sēd), n. The offspring of a hag: applied by Shakspeare in "The Tempest" to Caliban, son of the witch Seyorax.

Hag-seed, hence!

Fetch us in fuel; and be quick, thou wert best,
To answer other business. Shak., Tempest, i. 2.

bagship (hag'ship), n. [< hag¹ + -ship.] The designation of a hag or witch: used in the quotation as a title.

What's this? Oh, 'tis the charm her bagship gave me.
Middleton, The Witch.

bag-staff (hag'stáf), n. The staff or rod by which the divisions or portions are marked in wood assigned for felling. See hag³, 3.

bag's-tooth (hagz'tóth), n. Naut., a part of a pointing, pointing, etc., which is interwoven with the rest in an irregular manner so as to break the general uniformity of the work.

bag-taper (hag'tā'pēr), n. [Also hedge-taper, not, corruptly, high-taper, high-taper, formerly hagis-taper; < hag² or hedge + taper: so called because in former times a spike of the plant tapped in tallow was used as a taper.] The cat mullen, Verbascum Thapsus. See mullen.

bag-tracks (hag'traks), n. pl. Fairy rings. [Prov. Eng.] bag-nubut, n. Same as hackbut.

bag-weed (hag'wēd), n. [< hag¹ + weed¹: so used in allusion to the popular superstition that hags or witches rode through the air on homsticks.] The common broom, Cytisus varius.

For awful coveys of terrible things, . . .
On hagweed broom-sticks, and leathern wings,
Are hovering round the Hut! Hood, The Forge.

worm (hag'wērm), n. A viper or snake of kind. [Prov. Eng.]

(há), interj. Another spelling of hal¹.
a¹ (há'há'), interj. [Reduplication of hal¹.]
[An imitation of the sound of laughter.]

a² (há-há'), n. [Origin uncertain: see quotation.] A fence formed by a foss or ditch, sunk between slopes and not perceived till approached; a sunk fence. Also written aha, haw-haw.

The destruction of walls for boundaries, and the invention of fosses, an attempt then deemed so astonishing, that the common people called them Ha! Ha! to express their surprise at finding a sudden and unperceived check to their walk. Walpole, Modern Gardening.

Hahnemannian (há-ne-man'i-an), a. [< Hahnemann (see def.) + -ian.] Relating to S. C. Hahnemann (1755-1843), the founder of the homeopathic system of medicine. Also written Hahnemannian.

haidingerite (hi'ding-ēr-īt), n. [After the Austrian mineralogist Wilhelm von Haidinger (1795-1861).] 1. Hydrous arseniate of calcium, a rare earth occurring in minute crystals which are white and transparent, with a vitreous luster. — 2. Same as berthierite, a sulphid of antimony and iron.

Haidinger's brushes. See brush.

Haiduk, Hayduk (hi'dük), n. [Also Hayduk, hayduc; = D. heiduk = G. heiduk = Dan. Sw. duk = F. heiduque, < Hung. hajduk, lit. drovers, pl. of hajdu, a drover.] 1. Formerly, one of a class of mercenary foot-soldiers in Hungary of Magyar stock, distinguished for their gallantry in the field. For their fidelity to the Protestant cause throughout the religious insurrectionary war they were rewarded by Prince Bocska in 1605 with the privileges of nobility, and with a territorial possession called the Haiduk district, which was enlarged as Haiduk county in 1876. The Hungarian light infantry were called Haiduks in the eighteenth century, from a regiment constituted for a time by these people. Compare chasseur, 3.

2. [cap. or l. c.] In Hungary, Austria, Germany, etc., an attendant in a judicial court, or in a palace or mansion, when dressed in the Hungarian semi-military costume.

It was once one of the handsomest men in Europe, and would defy any heyduk of the court to measure a chest or a bag with me. Thackeray, Barry Lyndon, xi.

hailet, n. 1. A Middle English form of hay². — 2. [OF. = E. hay².] In her., a bearing representing a weir or dam made of osier or the like, planted on upright stakes, three or more stakes being visible. It is always in fesse.

haifer, n. An obsolete form of heifer.

hallowt, n. A form of heighaw.

halg, v. and n. See halke⁴.

halg² (hik), n. [Repr. Ar. halik, < hayrik, weave.] A piece of stuff used as an outer garment by the peoples of the Levant, especially by the desert tribes of Arabs. Its most familiar form is an oblong piece of loosely woven woolen cloth, in stripes of two or three colors. Also spelled haick, hyle.

The halke are often made of hand-woven wool, very thick and warm, others of silk, while the poorer classes wear a few yards of thin white cotton stuff.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 663.

hail (hāl), n. [< ME. hayle, hazel, < AS. hægel, hægl, hagol, hagol = D. hagel = LG. hagel = OHG. hagol, MHG. G. hagel = Icel. hagi = Sw. Dan. hagel, hail. Cf. Gr. κάλλις, κόχλις, a pebble, gravel; cf. hailstone.] Pellets of ice falling in showers. These pellets, called hailstones, frequently consist of a kernel of hard snow in the center, surrounded by alternate concentric layers of ice and snow; in other cases they have a radial structure. They assume various shapes, most commonly spheroidal, but some are pyramidal, others flat, and others irregularly oval. In size they are usually from a tenth to a quarter of an inch in diameter, but masses measuring from 1 to 15 inches in circumference and weighing over half a pound are of occasional occurrence. The fall of hail occurs chiefly in spring and summer, and most commonly precedes or accompanies a thunder-storm. The time of its continuance is always short, generally only a few minutes. The length of time requisite for the accretion of the larger hailstones is now believed to be obtained by the continued retention and repeated elevation in the atmosphere of a pellet, initially small, which is several times drawn into a current of moist air having a rapid ascensional and gyratory motion; in this way it is carried through successive regions of rain and snow. In a ship's log-book, abbreviated h.

Instead of strength of reason, he answers with a multitude of words, thinking . . . that he may use hail when he hath no thunder.
Bp. Wilkins, Discovery of New World, i. 9.
The island-valley of Avilion;
Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
Nor ever wind blows loudly.
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.
The origin of hail is still obscure, but it is probably formed by an intensely cold current of air passing into a region of warm moist air, and reducing the temperature of the whole below the freezing point.
Huxley, Physiography, p. 65.
In a hail-storm the ascending currents are so strong, and reach so high up into the upper strata of the atmosphere, that the rain-drops are carried up into the cold regions above, and into the central part within the isobaric and isothermic surface of the freezing-point, where they are frozen into hail.
W. Ferrel, Treatise on the Winds.

hail¹ (hāl), v. [E. dial. also haggle (see haggle²); < ME. hailen, < AS. hagalban = D. hagelen = G. hageln = Icel. hagla, hegla = Sw. hagla = Dan. hagla, hail; from the noun.] I. intrans. To pour down hail.
I wept and I wailed,
The tears down *hail*ed,
But nothing it availed.
Skelton, Philip Sparrow.

My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, . . . when it shall hail, coming down on the forest.
Isa. xxxii. 18, 19.

II. trans. To pour down or put forth like hail; emit in rapid succession.
For, ere Demetrius look'd on Hernia's eyne,
He hail'd down oaths, that he was only mine.
Shak., M. N. D., i. 1.
But Walter hail'd a score of names upon her.
Tennyson, Princess, Prol.

hail², a. See hale².
hail³ (hāl), interj. [A particular use of hail², a. = hale², a., after Icel. heill in similar use, as Heill, Magnus! hail, Magnus! kom heill, welcome ('come hale')! far heill, farewell ('go hale')! sit heill ('sit hale')! etc.; so in AS., hail beo thu, or hal wes thu, hail! lit. 'be thou whole' (see vassail). The Icel. heill, E. hail², hale² = AS. hāl, E. whole. The interj. hail is thus an abbreviated sentence expressing a wish, 'be whole,' i. e., be in good health, and equiv. to L. salve, plural salvete, or ave, plural avete (see salve⁴ and ave).] Be whole; be safe; be happy: a term of salutation now used without thought of its literal meaning, and merely as an exclamatory expression of well-wishing: used absolutely, or followed by a noun with to.

And they began to salute him, Haile Kyng of ye Jewes.
Bible of 1561, Mark xv. 18.
Hail to the Chief who in triumph advances!
Scott, L. of the L., ii. 19.
Hail to thee, blithe spirit.
Shelley, To a Skylark.

[Used in the following passage as a quasi-noun.]

The angel Hail
Bestow'd; the holy salutation used Long after to blest Mary, second Eve.
Milton, P. L., v. 385.]

All hail! a more emphatic form of hail³.
Cesar, all hail! Shak., J. C., ii. 2.

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall!
E. Perronet, Coronation Hymn.

Hail Mary. See Ave Maria, under ave.
hail³ (hāl), v. [< ME. hailen, heyllen, heglen, salute, greet, < hail, heil, as a salutation: see hail³, interj. Cf. equiv. hailse, hailse³.] I. trans. 1. To salute; welcome; address.
When we had *hail*ed each other, and had spoken those common words that be customably spoke at the first meeting and acquaintance of strangers, we went thence to my house. Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), Prol., p. 30.
They hail'd him father to a line of kings.
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1.

The man that hails you Tom or Jack.

Such hail the end of their existence as a port of refuge.
Lamb, New Year's Eve.

2. To call to, as a person, or, by metonymy, a place, house, ship, etc., at a distance; cry out to in order to attract attention.
Merham, intending to know what they were, *hail*ed them.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, i. 52.
The market boat is on the stream,
And voices hail it from the brink.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxxi.

The huge Earl Doorn, . . . like one that hails a ship, Cried out with a bold voice. Tennyson, Geraldine.
Ere the anchor had come home, a shout
Rang from the strand, as though the ship were *hail*ed.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 6.

II. intrans. To offer or exchange greeting or tidings; report or declare one's self.
They [the ships] came all together, with friendly salutations and gratulations one to another: which they terme by the name of Hayling: a ceremonie done solemnly, and in verie good order, with sound of Trumpets and noyse of cheerfull voyces. Hakluyt's Voyages, i. 609.

To hail for a trip, to state the quantity of the catch during a fishing-voyage: as, to hail for a trip of 50,000 pounds of halibut. [Colloq.] — To hail from, to come or profess to come from; belong to, as one's birthplace or residence: used specifically and originally of a ship with reference to the port at which she is registered, or from which she sets out on a voyage.

My companion hails from Little Athens.
L. M. Alcott, Hospital Sketches, p. 16.
hail³ (hāl), n. [< hail³, v.] A salutation; greeting; call; summons; challenge of attention.
His cheer sounded more like a view-hallo than a hail.
Scott, St. Roman's Well, xxi.

To pass the hail, on a man-of-war, to call out the station, as the men on lookout at night are required to do every half-hour, when the bell is struck, in order that the officer of the watch may know that the lookouts are vigilant.—Within hail, within call; within reach of the sound of the voice.

hail-fellow (hāl'fel'ō), n. [A compound word taken from the obs. phrase hail, fellow! So the fuller expression, "hail, fellow! well met!" is sometimes used as a descriptive adjective, as, "He was hail-fellow-well-met with everybody."] An intimate companion; a pleasant or genial companion.
Where diddest thou learne that, . . . being suffered to be familiar, thou shouldst waxe hail fellow?
Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 371.
Now man, that erst hail-fellow was with beast,
Waxe on to weene himself a god at least.
Sp. Hall, Satires, iii. 1.

At hail-fellow, very intimate; on familiar terms.
The master and servant are at hail-fellow.
J. Goodman, Winter Evening's Conferences.

hailset, v. t. [< ME. hailsen, haylsen, < Icel. heilsa = Sw. helsa = Dan. hilse, greet (= AS. hailsian, ME. halsen, greet: see halse³ of which hailse is thus a doublet), < Icel. heill, etc., = AS. hāl, whole, hale: see hail², hale², and cf. hail³, v. Cf. hail³, v. t., and halse³.] To greet; salute.
And therewith I turned me to Raphaell, and when we had *hail*ed the one the other, etc.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), Prol.

He *hail*ed me with mikel pride.
As Y god on dy Munday (Child's Ballads, I. 274).

hailshot (hāl'shot), n. pl. Small shot which scatter like hailstones in firing; grape-shot.
For our admiral . . . had provided all our muskets with hail-shot, which did so gaulle both the Indians and the Portugals that they made them presently retreat.
Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 711.

You should, by the same rule, control his bullet, in a line, except it were *hail*shot, and spread.

Root unknown; not connected with L. cæsaries, a head of hair. Hair in defs. 5 and 6 was orig. a different form, derived from the preceding, namely, ME. haire, hayre, heyre, < AS. hære (= OHG. hâra, hârâ (> F. hère) = Icel. hæra), f., haircloth, < hær, hair.] I. n. 1. One of the numerous fine filaments which more or less completely cover the skin of most mammals, and constitute the characteristic coat of this class of animals; any capillary outgrowth from the skin. Hairs are extravascular, non-nervous, epidermal, or exoskeletal structures, belonging to the same category as nails, scales, feathers, and other horny or cuticular outgrowths, being chiefly distinguished by their simplicity, and their extreme slenderness in proportion to their length, which may reach several feet. A hair consists of an outer or cuticular layer of cells, extremely variable in the details of their arrangement, generally imbricated and with their free edges presenting away from the skin. These constitute the hair-cuticle or cortex, upon the nature of which largely depends the capability of being woven or felted of some kinds of hair, as wool. Inside the cuticle is a tubular shaft of longitudinal fibers, resulting from fibrillation of cells, which may contain a core of granular cells, the pith or medulla of the hair. Air finds its way into the interstices of the pith. Many hairs are quite cylindrical, or have but slightly reniform cross-section; such are apt to be long, slender, and straight, and possess the least felting properties, especially if their cuticular cells be also smooth. Curly, kinky, or woolly hairs, as of the negro's head or a man's beard, owe this character chiefly to the fact that they are flattened in different planes in successive parts of their length. Hairs of extreme length and fineness grow upon the head of women; others are of microscopic size, retaining, however, the same structural character. Hairs of great comparative thickness and stiffness are called bristles, as those on the back of swine, the whiskers of a cat, etc. When still stouter and sharp-pointed, bristles become spines, as of the hedgehog; one extremely short, broad, blunt, flattened spine becomes a scale, as on a pangolin; and a hair which tends to branch out in a certain manner becomes a feather. (See feather.) An ordinary hair is divided into the root, which is inserted into the skin; the stem or shaft; and the point, which is the part into which the pith does not extend. The root is planted in a little pit or follicle formed by an inversion of the skin, the hair-follicle; this follicle has a dermic and an epidermic layer, and some of the latter which adheres when a hair is plucked out by the root is called the root-sheath. The root is commonly elongated or bulbous, constituting the hair-bulb. Associated with the hair-follicle may be one or more sebaceous glands whose secretion keeps the hair glossy, and tiny muscles (arrectores pili) are sometimes attached to the sheath of the root, whose action may cause the hair to bristle or "stand on end." (See horripilation.) A hair is sometimes colorless, but oftenest heavily pigmented, giving animals their natural colors, in which various shades of black, brown, and gray, with flaxen or yellow, are the commonest, the purer reds, blues, and greens being comparatively rare. In all species of mammals, including man, the hair attains a definite length on certain areas of the body; it is cut off, it grows again. Most mammals have at least two sets of hairs: one comparatively long, stout, and straight, coming to the surface and overlying a finer, shorter, and more curly set, among the roots of which latter a still finer coating of hairs may be found. The aggregate of the hairs is the pelage, corresponding to the plumage of a bird; a copious pelage of fine hairs is a fur, as of the fursack, otter, beaver, etc.; the fur of the sheep kind is called a fecce. In most animals the hairs have a definite period of growth, maturity, and decay, which results in the periodical shedding of the coat. Hair is a specially cuticular structure, and hence mostly confined to the exterior of the body; but since epidermis becomes insensibly modified into the epithelium of mucous membrane, so hairs may be found growing inside any of the natural openings of the body, as the ears, nostrils, mouth, and various cutaneous pouches of different animals. Like other horny structures, hairs are often a secondary sexual character, either appearing on certain parts of the body coincidentally with the maturity of the sexual function (see puberty), or growing in a certain way in one sex and not in the other, as the human beard, the mane of the lion, etc. Though hairs are in themselves non-nervous, certain hairs on some animals constitute feelers or tactile organs of great delicacy; such are known as tactile hairs.

A Hair in its Hair-sac, highly magnified.

a, shaft of hair above the skin; b, cortical substance of the shaft, the medulla not being visible; c, newest portion of hair, growing on the papilla (v.); d, cuticle of hair; e, cavity of hair-sac; f, epidermis and root-sheath of the hair-sac, corresponding to that of the integument (m); g, division between dermis and epidermis; h, dermis of hair-sac, corresponding to that of the integument (l); i, mouths of sebaceous glands; n, horny epidermis of integument.

peculiar to animals of the sheep kind is called a fecce. In most animals the hairs have a definite period of growth, maturity, and decay, which results in the periodical shedding of the coat. Hair is a specially cuticular structure, and hence mostly confined to the exterior of the body; but since epidermis becomes insensibly modified into the epithelium of mucous membrane, so hairs may be found growing inside any of the natural openings of the body, as the ears, nostrils, mouth, and various cutaneous pouches of different animals. Like other horny structures, hairs are often a secondary sexual character, either appearing on certain parts of the body coincidentally with the maturity of the sexual function (see puberty), or growing in a certain way in one sex and not in the other, as the human beard, the mane of the lion, etc. Though hairs are in themselves non-nervous, certain hairs on some animals constitute feelers or tactile organs of great delicacy; such are known as tactile hairs.

Hairs of Various Animals, magnified. A, Indian bat; B, mouse; C, sable; D, man.

From every haire of bold Robins head
The blood ran trickling down.
Robin Hood and the Stranger (Child's Ballads, V. 407).
He could distinguish and divide
A hair 'twixt south and south-west side.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. 1. 68.

2. The aggregate of the hairs which grow on any mammal; hairs collectively or in the mass; in the widest sense, a dermal coat or covering either of hair (specifically so called), wool, or fur; pelage; in common use, the natural capillary covering of a person's head: formerly sometimes in the plural.

The redde he me how Sampson loste his heres Sleepyng, his lemmann kytte ite his scheres.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 721.

His naturall hair, which was exceedingly thicke and curled, was so prettily elevated in height, that it served him always instead of a hat. Coryat, Crudities, l. 70.

In troth, thy hair is of an excellent colour since I saw it. O those bright tresses, like to threads of gold!
Dekker and Webster, Westward Ho, iii. 4.

3. On animals, with the exception of most mammals, a filament; any fine capillary or hair-like outgrowth from the body or any part of it, but especially its surface; one of the objects which compose the hairiness, pubescence, or pilosity of an animal, or such objects collectively: used in both the singular and the plural: as, the hair or hairs of a caterpillar, that which clothes or those which clothe a lobster's gills, etc. Most members of the animal kingdom have hair or hairs of some kind, resembling the peculiar covering of mammals more or less nearly in appearance or function, or both, and consequently taking the same name, though the structural character of these appendages may be entirely different.

4. In bot., an expansion of the epidermis, consisting of a single cell or of a row or number of cells. Hairs assume a variety of forms, even the simple or unicellular ones being often branched, variously curved, or stellate. Cotton-fibers are hairs consisting of elongated single cells. Compound hairs may start from a single cell or a group of cells, and may have their derivative cells arranged in many ways. According to form, hairs may be called capitate, clavate, uncinate, barbed, pelate, etc. They are often glandular and viscid at the extremity. Most hairs or branches of hairs in plants are more or less conical.

Vegetable Hairs. 1, stellate hair of Draba alpina; 2, multicellular hair of Eriochloa villosa; 3, simple (unicellular) hair of Valeriana capitata. (All highly magnified.)

5. Haircloth; a garment of haircloth, especially a hair shirt used for penance.

She . . . under hir robe of gold, that sat ful fayre, Hadde next her flesshe yclad hir in an heyre.
Chaucer, Second Nun's Tale, l. 133.

6. A cloth, mat, or other fabric of hair used for various purposes in the trades, as in the extraction of oils, manufacture of soap from cocoanut-oil, etc.

Each bag [woolen bags containing oil-seed meal] is further placed within hairs, thick mats of horse-hair bound with leather.
Encyc. Brit., XVII. 742.

7. Particular natural set or direction; course; order; drift; grain; character; quality.

The quality and hair of our attempt Brooks no division. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

A lady of my hair cannot want pitying.
Fletcher (and another?), Nice Valour, l. 1.

8. In mech., a locking spring or other safety contrivance in the lock of a rifle or pistol, which may be released by a very slight pressure on a hair-trigger.—9. One of the polyps, as sertularians and others, which grow on oyster-shells. See graybeard, 3, and redbeard.—African hair, the fiber of the leaves of the small palm of southern Europe and northern Africa, Chamerops humilis.—Against the hair, contrary to the natural set of a thing; against the grain.

Notwithstanding, I will go against the haire in all things, so I may please thee in anie thing.
Lilly, Euphues and his England, sig. Aa I.

He is melancholy without cause, and merry against the hair!
Shak., T. and C., l. 2.

A hair of the dog that bit one, the same thing that caused the malady or trouble used as a remedy or means of relief; specifically, spirits drunk in the morning after a debauch, for the purpose of steadying the nerves: in allusion to the popular superstition that a hair of the dog that has bitten one will cure the bite.

Such heart-sick woe,
By an immoderate drunkenness procurede,
Must by a haire of the same be cured.
Time's Whistle (E. E. T. S.), l. 1860.

Elsey need not be blamed for pitying her [Italy]: only for holding with most of our poets a vague notion that her woes were to be cured by a hair of the dog who bit her.
Kingsley, Two Years Ago, x.

Auditory hairs. See auditory.—Berenice's hair. See Coma Berenices, under coma.—Bulb of a hair. See bulb.—Buttoned hairs. In entom., long stout hairs or setae with a knob or button at one end. Also called knobbed hairs.—Camel's hair. See camel.—Glandular hairs. See glandular.—Gray hairs. figuratively, old age; as, to respect one's gray hairs.—Knobbed hairs. Same as buttoned hairs.—Not to turn a hair, not to show any sign of being ruffled, disordered, or discomposed.

A pint of port? Man alive! we can take two bottles, and never turn a hair. W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 66.

Not worth a hair, of no value; contemptible.—Of a hair, exactly alike.

For the pedlar and the tinker, they are two notable knaves, both of a haire.
Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier (Harl. Misc., V. 417). (Davies.)

Stinging hair one of the coiled filaments which spring out of the cnidae or nematocysts of jellyfish and other ctenophores; a cnidocil: the urticating filament or netting thread of a thread-cell. See cut under cnida.—Tactile hair, a hair which subserves any special sense of touch, as those of the whiskers of a cat. Such hairs are technically called pilic tactile. See vibrissa.—The turn of a hair, a close chance; a narrow escape.

Colonel Capadose said that it was the turn of a hair that they had n't buried him alive. The Century, XXXVI. 127.

To a hair, to a nicety; with the utmost exactness or precision.

I know my advocate to a hair, and what Will fetch him from his prayers, if he use any.
Fletcher, Spanish Curate, iv. 2.

To comb one's hair the wrong way, to vex or anger one, especially by speech; address one irritatingly. [Colloq.]—To split hairs, to be unduly nice in making distinctions. Compare hair-splitter, hair-splitting.

II. a. Made of or stuffed with hair: as, hair jewelry; a hair mattress. [The earlier adjective, hairen, is now obsolete.]—Hair broom, a broom made of bristles technically called hair.—Hair glove, a glove made of rough haircloth for rubbing the skin while bathing.—Hair line, a line made of hair; now, specifically, a fishing-line of horsehair. Lines made of hair, especially clothes-lines, were common in the middle ages and down to the seventeenth century.—Hair pencil, a fine brush or pencil made of hair, used in painting, etc. Hair pencils are made of very fine hair, as of the camel, squirrel, marten, badger, polecat, etc., mounted in a quill when of small size.—Hair shirt, a shirt made of haircloth, used especially for penance. See haircloth.

When no prelate's lawn with hair-shirt lined
Is half so incoherent as my mind.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, I. i. 165.

hair¹ (hâr), v. i. [< hair¹, n.] To produce or grow hair. [Colloq.]—To hair up, to support a growth of polyps, algae, etc., as oysters.

hair², v. t. Another spelling of hare².

hairbell (hâr'bel), n. An erroneous spelling of harebell. [This spelling, taken as hair¹ + bell, has been preferred by Lindley, Prior, and others, as being descriptive of the filiform stalk and bell-shaped flowers of the plant.]

hair-bird (hâr'bêrd), n. Same as chip-bird. [U. S.]

hair-bracket (hâr'brak'et), n. In ship-building, a molding which in many vessels comes in at the back of the figurehead or runs aft from it.

The middle and small rails had their lower ends forward resting on the hair bracket for continuation of the curve of the cheek, and their after ends simply butted against the side.

Thearle, Naval Arch., § 232.

hairbrained (hâr'brând), a. An erroneous spelling of hobrebrained.

hairbranch-tree (hâr'branch-trê), n. A South African shrub, Trichocladus crinitus, of the order Hamamelidæ. The staminate flowers have long, linear-spatulate petals with revolute margins, whence perhaps the name. See Trichocladus.

hairbreadth (hâr'bredth), n. and a. I. n. The diameter or breadth of a hair; an infinitesimal space or distance. Among the Jews a hairbreadth was reckoned the 45th part of an inch; in Burma it is 1/10 of an inch. Now generally written hair's-breadth.

You jest; but proud Cynisca makes me sad;
Nay; I'm within a hair-breadth raving mad;

Faukes, tr. of Idylls of Theocritus, xiv.

He answered his description to a hair-breadth in everything.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, I. 10.

II. a. Of the breadth of a hair; extremely narrow.

Of hair-breadth 'scapes I the imminent deadly breach;
Of being taken by the insolent foe
And sold to slavery.

Shak., Othello, I. 3.

A love story, filled as usual with hair-breadth escapes, jealous quarrels, and questions of honor, runs through nearly every one of these dramas.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 232.

hair-brush (hâr'brush), n. A brush for dressing and smoothing the hair.

hair-bulb (hâr'bulb), n. The root of a hair when bulbous, as it usually is.

haircap-moss (hâr'kap-môs), n. Moss of the genus Polytrichum, especially P. juniperinum, having the calyptra covered with fine hairs. It is said to have diuretic properties.

hair-cell (hâr'sel), n. 1. See cell.—2. The trichocyst of an infusorian, corresponding to the thread-cell or nematocyst of a coelenterate.

hair-clam (hâr'klam), n. An ark-shell; one of the various species of Arctica. Also called hair-quag and blood-quag.

haircloth (hâr'klôth), n. Stuff or cloth made wholly or partly of hair, especially of the hair of the horse or of the camel. The smooth glossy haircloth formerly much used for covering chairs, sofas, etc., has the web of long hairs of horses' tails and the warp usually of linen yarn. Coarser haircloth is made for various purposes (in some countries for garments) of the shorter hairs of the horse and of various other animals, twisted together and used for both warp and web. The sackcloth of the Bible was of this character. Shirts of such haircloth, rough and prickly, were formerly often worn next the skin by ascetics and penitents. See hair¹, n., § 6.

haircup-flower (hâr'kup-flou'êr), n. In Australia, a myrtaceous plant, Calythia tetragona, the calyx of which is provided with 10 awl-shaped, elongated bristles.

hair-dividers (hâr'di-vî'dêrz), n. pl. Hair-compasses. See compass.

hair-dress (hâr'dres), n. A head-dress; the manner of arranging the hair. [Rare.]

The Angakut of Cumberland Sound wear at certain parts the hairdress used by southern tribes.

Amer. Antiquarian, X. 41.

hair-dresser (hâr'dres'êr), n. One who dresses or cuts hair; a barber.

hair-dye (hâr'di), n. A preparation for altering the color of the hair.

haired (hâr'd), p. a. [< ME. hered; < hair¹ + -ed²] Having hair: commonly used in composition: as, long-haired, yellow-haired, dark-haired, etc.

He was . . . couert as a capull; all the coarse ouer, fro the hed to the hele, herit full thicke.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 5531.

hair-eel (hâr'êl), n. Same as hairworm.
hair-ent (hâr'en), a. [< ME. heeren, < AS. hær-en (= MHG. hâren, G. hâren), of hair, < hær, hair, + -en²] Hair; made of hair.

It must needs be to his sublimed and clarified spirit more punitive and afflictive than his hair-ent shirt and his ascetic diet was to his body.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1825), I. 84.

haireve, n. See hairif.

hair-feather (hâr'fêth'êr), n. See feather.

hair-follicle (hâr'fol'i-kl), n. A tubular depression of the skin from the bottom of which a hair grows. It consists of a dermic and an epidermic coat. The latter is next to the root of the hair, to which it commonly adheres when the hair is plucked, and may easily be seen with the naked eye. It is directly continuous both with the cuticular surface of the skin and with the root of the hair itself. The dermic coat is similarly continuous with the corium or true skin, but distinct from the hair, and may often be separated into three recognizable layers: a basement membrane next to the cuticular layer of the follicle, a middle muscular or at least contractile layer, and a third layer of connective tissue. Associated with the follicles are the nutrient blood-vessels, nerves, sebaceous glands, and special muscles. A hair-follicle is also called a root-sheath, a name sometimes restricted to its epidermic layer. See cut under hair¹.

hair-gland (hâr'glând), n. 1. One of the minute sebaceous glands of the root of a hair, whose secretion serves to keep it glossy. See cut under hair¹.—2. In bot., a viscid, secreting, or odoriferous gland at the tip of a hair. In Droseraceæ, for example, the hair-glands are viscid or watery, whence the name sun-dew, from their resemblance to drops of dew.

hair-grass (hâr'gräs), n. One of several species of grass bearing small flowers on slender, hair-like branches, especially Deschampsia (Aira) cespitosa, D. (A.) flexuosa, and Agrostis scabra.
hairif (hâr'if), a. Also written harif, hariff, heiriff, haireve, and haritch, and variously accented. hairup, hairough, etc., prop. hayrif, < ME. hayryf, harife, hariffe, etc., < AS. hegerife, appar. < hege, a hedge (E. hay², q. v.), + rif* (Ettmüller—not verified) = icel. rifr, abundant, rife: see rife.] The common goose-grass or bedstraw, Galium Aparine, a plant belonging to the natural order Rubiaceæ, and closely related to the madder. See Galium, 2, and goose-grass.

hairif, n. See hairif.

hairiness (hâr'î-nes), n. The state of being hairy; the state of abounding in hair or being covered with it.

A character which, like hairiness, exists throughout the whole of the mammalia.

A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 348.

hair-knob (hâr'nob), n. The bulbous lower end of the root of a hair.

hair-lace (hâr'läs), n. [Early mod. E. also herelace.] A fillet for tying up the hair of the head.

Let me be whipt to death with ladies' hair-laces.

Middleton, Family of Love, I. 2.

A woman's hair-lace or fillet.

Harvey.

hairless (hâr'les), a. [< hair¹ + -less.] Destitute of hair; bald: as, hairless scalps.

hair-lichen (hâr'li-ken), n. In med., lichen pilaris, a variety of lichenous rash, in which the small tubercles are limited to the roots of the hairs of the skin, and scale off after ten days.

hair-line (hâr'lin), n. 1. A very slender line made in writing or drawing; a hair-stroke.—2. In printing, a very thin line on a type; also, a style of type consisting entirely of thin lines.

hairlip (hâr'lip), n. An erroneous spelling of harelip.

hair-meal, n. [< ME. hermele; < hair¹ + meal², a portion.] The thickness of a hair; a hair's-breadth.

When the shadow of the pyn enteth anything within the circle of the plate an her-meal.

Chaucer, Astrolabe, il. § 38.

hair-needle (hâr'nêd'l), n. [*< ME. not found; AS. hærnæd, "calamistrum" (Lye), < hær, hair, + næd, needle.] A hair-pin.

hair-net (hâr'net), n. A net worn by women to confine the hair. Compare caul, 1 (a), crestpine.
hair-oil (hâr'oil), n. Oil for dressing the hair, generally perfumed.

hair-picker (hâr'pik'êr), n. A machine for cleaning hair and preparing it for use, as in upholstery.

hair-pin (hâr'pin), n. A pin used to support braids or plaits of hair, or to maintain the head-dress, of whatever description, in its proper place. The simplest kind is made of wire bent in the form of the letter U, but hair-pins are made also of ivory, bone, tortoise-shell, wood, and metal, and in various shapes, often with ornamental heads or tops.

hair-powder (hâr'pou'dêr), n. A scented white powder used to sprinkle upon the hair of the head, in very general use in hair-dressing in the eighteenth century. An English law required it to be made exclusively of starch, but flour was sometimes used.

hair-pyrites (hâr'pi-rî'têz), n. Native sulphid of nickel occurring in capillary filaments, of a yellow-gray color. Also called haarkies and millérite.

hair-quag (hâr'kwog), n. Same as hair-clam. [Rhode Island, U. S.]

hair-sac (hâr'sak), n. Same as hair-sheath.

hair-salt (hâr'sält), n. [= G. haar-salz; so called by Werner.] Same as epsomite and alunogen.

hair's-breadth (hârz'bredth), n. The breadth of a hair, taken as the type of an indefinitely minute space or line, literal or figurative. See hairbreadth.

The people has a right to be governed not only well, but as well as possible, and owes no thanks to its servants the governors for stopping a hair's-breadth short of this point.

Brougham.

It is precisely this audacity of self-reliance, I suspect, which goes far toward making the sublime, and which, falling by a hair's-breadth short thereof, makes the ridiculous.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 301.

hair-seal (hâr'sêl), n. An eared seal of the subfamily Trichoplocinae: so called in distinction from fur-seal.

hair-shaped (hâr'shâpt), a. In bot., finely filiform or hair-like: often applied to the fine ramifications of the inflorescence of grasses.

hair-sheath (hâr'shêth), n. The follicle in which the root of a hair grows and is sheathed; a hair-follicle or root-sheath. Also called hair-sac. See cut under hair¹.

The softening or destruction of the hair-sheaths, either by lime or by putrefaction.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 369.

hair-space (hâr'späs), n. The thinnest space used by printers.

hair-splitter (hâr'split'êr), n. One given to hair-splitting or making sophistical distinctions in reasoning.

It is not the cavilling hair-splitter, but, on the contrary, the single-eyed servant of truth, that is most likely to insist upon the limitation of expressions too wide or too vague.

De Quincey, Autobiog. Sketches, p. 61.

hair-splitting (hâr'split'ing), n. and a. I. n. The act or practice of making sophistical or over-nice distinctions in reasoning. Medieval writers were especially given to this method of escaping inconvenient consequences of their principles. The word is not properly applicable to the drawing of sound distinctions, however minute or difficult of apprehension they may be.

Hair-splitting is a consecrated term to decry what might with more justice be termed "a tendency towards mathematical exactitude in reasoning."

Mind, XIII. 390.

II. a. Making sophistical or over-nice distinctions in reasoning; also, made by such reasoning.

In the eulogy on Story he [Charles Sumner] speaks of . . . the ancient hair-splitting technicalities of special pleading.

N. A. Rev., CX XVI. 5.

hair-spring (hâr'spring), n. In watch-making, the fine hair-like spring coiled up within the balance-wheel and imparting motion to it.

hairst (hâr'st), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of hairst.

As hairst afore the Shirra-muir. Burns, Halloween.

hair-star (hâr'stär), n. A feather-star; a living erinoid of the family Comatulidæ.

hairster (hâr'stêr), n. [< ME. hayrester; < hair¹ + -ster.] A maker of hair garments; a worker in hair. York Plays, Int., p. xxv.

hairstreak (hâr'strêk), n. One of the small dark butterflies of the genus Thecla; a theclan: so called from the minute hair-like appendages of the hind wings. The green hairstreak is T. rubi; the black, T. pruni; there are many others.

hair-stroke (hâr'strök), n. 1. A fine up-stroke in penmanship.—2. In printing, the fine line at the top or bottom of a letter; a serif; a hair-line.

hairtail (hâr'täl), n. Any fish of the family Trichiuridæ, as Trichurus lepturus, remarkable for the attenuation of its tail as well as for its silvery body, whence it is also called silvery hairtail. The species inhabit tropical and sub-tropical seas; that above named is most common in the Atlantic.

hair-trigger (här'trig'ér), n. In a firearm, a secondary trigger controlling a safety locking device which secures the chief trigger, by which the piece is fired. The hair-trigger is so adjusted as to be actuated by a very light pressure, and sets free a spring mechanism called the hair, which strikes the tumbler catch and throws the seal out of a notch in the tumbler.

Hair-triggers are now but very seldom made, and are considered very old-fashioned.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 244.

hairtrigger-flower (här'trig-ér-flou'ér), n. An Australian plant of the genus Stylidium, especially S. graminifolium, in which the column of stamens possesses a singular kind of irritability, causing it when touched to spring instantly from one side to the other of the corolla-tube.

hair-work (här'wèrk), n. Work done or something made with hair, specifically human hair. This material is or has been used for many kinds of work, generally intended for ornament, as fine netting (compare point-tresse), brooches, necklaces, watch-guards, purses, flowers, etc.; and it has also been worked into the form of pictures, usually small.

hair-worker (här'wèr'kér), n. One who makes hair-work.

hairworm (här'wèrm), n. A nematoid thread-worm of the genus Gordius or family Gordiidae in a broad sense; so called from its fineness. Also called hair-eel. See eel under Gordius.

There were hair-worms fabled to spring from horse-hair, in black lines writing on the surface.

S. Judd, Margaret, i. 4.

hairy (här'i), a. [< hair + -y]. 1. Overgrown with hair; covered or abounding with hair. In botany a plant is said to be hairy when the hairs are simple (not branched), and separately distinguishable. (See hair, 4.) Specifically used in entomology to describe a surface densely covered with short and rather stiff hairs; distinguished from pilose, villose, pubescent, etc.

Esau my brother is a hairy man. Gen. xxvii. 11.

2. Consisting of hair or of something like hair; having the character or appearance of hair; as, the hairy covering of an animal; the hairy filaments of a plant.

Storms have shed

From vines the hairy honours of their head.

Dryden.

3. Having or characterized by something resembling hair.

When my sword,

Advanced thus, to my enemies appear'd

A hairy comet, threatening death and ruin

To such as durst behold it!

Massinger, Unnatural Combat, i. 1.

Hairy oubit. See oubit.

hairybait (här'i-bät), n. The lung-worm or white-rag worm, Nephthys ceca.

hairycrown (här'i-kroun), n. The red-breasted merganser, Mergus serrator. J. T. Sharpless, 1833. [Chesapeake Bay, U. S.]

hairyhead (här'i-hed), n. The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Southern U. S.]

hait, hayt, interj. [ME., < OF. hait, hayt, heit, etc., pleasure, joy, eagerness, ardor, as used in the phrase de hait, a hait, a grant hait, with eagerness or ardor, quickly.] A word of encouragement or command to a draft-animal to urge him forward.

Hait Brok, hayt Scot; what spare ye for the stones?

Chaucer, Friar's Tale, i. 245.

With a hait, with a ree, with a wo, with a gee!

Old harvest song.

haith (häth), interj. Faith! by my faith! See faith, interj. [Scotch.]

Haith, lad, yelittle ken about it. Burns, The Two Dogs.

haiver, v. i. See haver.

haivers, n. pl. See havers.

hajilij (haj'i-lij), n. [African.] The bito-tree, Balanites Egyptiaca, belonging to the natural order Simarubaceae, tribe Picramnieae, and inhabiting northern Africa and southern and western Asia. The fruit is a fleshy edible drupe with a pentagonal stone that yields a valuable oil called zachu. In Africa there is a proverb that a bito-tree has the same value as a milk-cow. It is a thorny shrub or small tree of forbidding aspect, and inhabits dry barren places.

haji, hajji. See hadj, hadji.

hake¹ (hāk), n. [*< ME. hake (not found), < AS. haca, also haca, lit. a hook, but found only in the sense of 'bolt' or 'bar' (in glosses), = D. haak, a hook, = OHG. hāko (for hache*?), MHG. hāke, hāken, G. hake, haken, a hook, = Icel. haki = Sw. Norw. hake = Dan. hage, a hook (cf. deriv. Icel. haka = Sw. haka = Dan. hage, the chin); connected with AS. hōc, E. hook, and hake² (hāk), n. [Also haak; < ME. hake ("fysche, squilla," Prompt. Parv.), a short form (perhaps due to Scand. influence; cf. Norw. hake-fisk, a fish with a hooked under jaw, esp. of salmon and trout, lit. 'hook-fish'; Norw. hake, hook) of E. dial. haked: see haked.] 1. A gadoid fish of the family Merlucciidae, Merluccius smiridus or vulgaris, related to and resembling a cod, found on the Atlantic coasts of Europe. It has a short triangular first dorsal fin, elongated sinuated second dorsal and anal fins, and complete ventrals. It is voracious in habits and little esteemed for the table. The name is extended to other species of the genus, as M. bilinearis, the silver hake of New England, and M. productus, the merlucio of California. See Merluccius.

2. A gadoid fish of the genus Phycis, common along the Atlantic coast of North America, as P. chuss, P. tenuis, and P. regius, recognized by the reduction of the ventral fins to two or three filamentous rays. These correspond to the English P. blennioides, the hake's-dame or forkbeard. They are all known as codlings, and some are called squirrel-hakes.

They are generally known as hakes, the true hake (Merluccius) being called silver-hake or whiting.

Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 273.

3. A gadoid fish of New Zealand, Lotella rhacinus, which has flattened ventrals of 6 rays, and a short anterior and long graduated second dorsal and anal fins.—Hake's-dame, the forkbeard. See def. 2 above. [Local, Eng. (Cornish).]—Silver hake, the American hake, Merluccius bilinearis, corresponding to the European M. smiridus. Also called whiting, New England whiting, and Old England hake.—Sow or sow-belly hake, an old female hake.—Squirrel-hake, one of two gadoid fishes of the genus Phycis, P. chuss and P. tenuis, found on the North Atlantic coast of North America.

Halesia (hāl'ē-si-ā), n. [Named after Stephen Hales (1677-1761), a distinguished botanist.] The generic name of the snowdrop-orsilvorbell-tree of the southern United States, belonging to the natural order Styracaceae, distinguished from Styrax and Symplocos chiefly by its winged fruit. According to Bentham and Hooker, the most Asiatic genus Pterostyrax should be united with Halesia; but Gray did not accept this view. The plants are handsome shrubs or small trees, with white bell-shaped flowers on slender peduncles, appearing before the leaves, and usually borne on drooping or more or less horizontal branches, forming arches or rows of bells along the under side, and thus giving to the whole plant a beautiful appearance. Two of the three species, H. diptera and H. pernifera, are natives of the Gulf States and Georgia. The remaining and best-known species, H. tetraptera, extends as far north as West Virginia and southern Illinois, doing well in the parks of Washington.

Halesiaceae (hāl'ē-si-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Halesia + -aceae.] A name given by Don in 1828 to a natural order of plants, consisting of Halesia only, now included in the Styracaceae.

Kath. What is your will, sir, that you send for me?

Shak., T. of the S., v. 2.

2. A sanctuary.—3. Lands held of a religious foundation.

The men of the Halidome, as it was called, of St. Mary's Scott, Monastery, ii.

halieutics (hal-i-ū'tiks), n. [L. halieutica (the title of a poem on fishing, by Ovid), < Gr. ἁλιευτικά (the title of a poem by Oppian), neut. pl. (cf. ἁλιευτική, sc. τέχνη, the art of fishing, fem. sing.) of ἁλιευτικός, of or for fishing (cf. ἁλιεύτης, and ἁλιεύς, a fisher), < ἁλιεύειν, fish, be a fisher, < ἄλς, the sea.] A treatise on fishes, or on the art of fishing: as, the Halieutics of Oppian.

Halifax law or inquest. See law 1.

Halidæ (hal-i'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halía + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, generally referred to the order Toxoglossa, represented by the genus Halía. The shell is so much like that of Achatina that it was long regarded as a terrestrial form. A single living species is known, inhabiting deep water about the Spanish coast, especially near Cadiz. It also occurs in the Tertiary formation of Italy.

Halimassit, n. An obsolete form of Hallowmias.

Halimeda (hal-i-mē'dā), n. [NL. (Lamoureux, 1812), appar. irreg. < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + μήδιον, some plant.] A genus of calcareous green-spored marine algæ, of the order Siphonææ of some authors. The fronds are jointed, and resemble cacti. The best-known species is H. opuntia, found in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and the Mediterranean sea. Lindley made this genus the type of the tribe Halimedidæ. Sometimes written Halymeda.

Halimedææ (hal-i-mē'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Decaisne, 1842), < Halimeda + -ææ.] A group of algæ, of the family Nematorhizææ, consisting of the two genera Halimeda and Udotea.

Halimedidæ (hal-i-mē'dī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halimeda + -idæ.] In Lindley's system of botanical classification, a tribe of the Confervæææ having the frond polysiphonous, made up of tubes which are continuous or jointed, and more or less densely branched. Sometimes written Halymedidæ. See Halimeda.

halimotet, n. Same as hallmote.

Halimus (hal-i-mus), n. [NL. (Wallroth, 1822), < Gr. ἄλμος, of the sea, marine, < ἄλς, the sea.] 1. A genus of maritime plants, of the natural order Chenopodiaceæ, now reduced to a section of Atriplex.—2. [L. c.] Atriplex Halimus, a well-known plant of the south European coasts.

hallographer (hal-i-og'ra-fēr), n. [< haliography + -er 1.] One who writes about the sea. Bailey, 1727.

hallography (hal-i-og'ra-fī), n. [Better haligraphy, < Gr. ἄλς (in comp. usually ἄλς), the sea, + -γραφία, < γράφω, write.] A description of the sea. See thalassography. Bailey, 1731.

Haliomma (hal-i-om'ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + ὄμμα, eye.] The typical genus of Halioniommatidæ. It is referred by some to the Sphæridæ.

Halioniommatidæ (hal-i-o-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halioniomma (t) + -idæ.] A family of radiolarians, named from the genus Halioniomma.

Haliotidæ (hal-i-ot'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haliotis + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, typified by the genus Haliotis, containing the sea-ears, ear-shells, abalones, or ormers. The animal has a short muzzle and subulate tentacles, two branchial plumes, and a margin developing a posterior (oval) fold or siphon which occupies the slit or perforation in the shell. The shell is ear-shaped and flatly spiral, with the aperture almost coextensive with the shell and limited only by the flattened columellar area: the back near the outer margin is perforated by a row of holes. See abalone.

Haliotis (hal-i-ō'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + οἶς (ōr-) = E. ear 1.] The typical genus of the family Haliotidæ; the ear-shells: so called from the excessive width of the aperture and the flatness of the small spire, which give it an ear-like or saucer-shaped figure. They are mostly tropical or subtropical, and have commercial value as ornaments and as furnishing a mother-of-pearl used in inlaying, etc. The animal is used for food. See abalone.

haliotoid (hal-i-ō'toid), a. [< Haliotis + -oid.] Like an ear-shell; resembling or pertaining to the Haliotidæ.

Haliphysema (hal'i-fi-sē'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + ψύσμα, that which is blown up, a bubble, a half-formed shell, etc., < φύσσω, blow up, inflate.] A genus of so-called sponges of extremely simple structure, resembling a gastrula. The animal is spindle-shaped, and the body consists of two single layers of cells, an endoderm and an ectoderm inclosing a central cavity with a mouth at one end, the other end being fixed to some object. The outer layer of cells is coalescent, and includes foreign substances, as grains of sand. It is one of two genera of chalk-sponges constituting an order Physemaria of the class Calcisporangia. It is really a foraminiferous type, and not a sponge at all.

Halipiana (hal-ip'lā-nā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + πλάνος, wandering: see planet.] A genus of sea-swallows, of the subfamily Sterninæ; the sooty terns. H. fuliginosa is the common sooty tern or egg-bird of the United States. The genus is often merged in Sterna. J. Wagler, 1832.

halipid (hal'i-plid), n. A beetle of the family Halipidæ.

Halipidæ (hal-ip'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halipius + -idæ.] A family of hydradephagous beetles. The metasternum has an antecostal piece separated by a well-marked suture reaching from one side to the other and extending in a triangular process between the hind coxae; the antennæ are 10-jointed; the hind coxae are fixed; and large plates almost entirely conceal the abdomen. They are minute oval and very convex water-beetles, of a yellow color spotted with black. They are often united with the Dytiscidæ. Kirby, 1837.

Halipius (hal'i-plus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλιπύς, contr. of ἁλιπύς, sailing on the sea, also covered with water, < ἄλς, the sea, + πλεῖν, sail.] The typical genus of Halipidæ. H. fasciatus is an example. Latreille.

Haliscoleina (hal-i-skō-lē-i'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + σκόληξ (σκαληκ), a worm, esp. the earthworm.] In Gegenbaur's system of classification, a group of marine chætopodous worms, represented by such genera as Polychætholmus and Capitella: distinguished from the earthworms, or Scolelma.

Halistemma (hal-i-stem'ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + στέμμα, a fillet, crown.] The typical genus of Halistemmatidæ, having a spirally coiled sacculle, a single terminal filament, and no involucre. Huxley, 1859.

Halistemmatidæ (hal-i-ste-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halistemma (t) + -idæ.] A family of physophorous hydrozoans, of the class Siphonophora, typified by the genus Halistemma.

halite (hal'it), n. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + -ite 2.] In mineral, native rock-salt.

halitheriid (hal-i-thē'ri-id), n. A fossil sirenian, one of the Halitheriidae.

Halitheriidae (hal'i-thē-ri'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halitherium + -idæ.] A family of fossil sirenians from the Miocene and early Pliocene, typified by the genus Halitherium, representing a generalized type of sirenians. They had large tusk-like upper incisors, as in Halicore, and an ossified femur articulated with the pelvis. Remains of individuals of the family have been found in many places in Europe, and several genera have been separated from Halitherium, which formerly included all the extinct sirenians.

Halitherium (hal-i-thē-ri-um), n. [NL. (Kaup), < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + θηρίον, a beast.] A genus of extinct Sirenia from the Miocene, the type of the family Halitheriidae. It appears to have possessed distinct though small hindlimbs, no trace of which has been found in any of the existing sirenians. Also spelled Halitherium.

halituous (ha-lit'ū-us), a. [< L. halitus (halitu-), breath: see halitus.] 1†. Like breath; vaporous.

Part of it, being cast upon a live coal, did by its blue and halituous flame discover itself to be of the nature of that salt. Boyle, Works, i. 363.

2. In pathol., moist as if from being breathed upon: said of the skin when covered with a slight moisture.

halitus (hal'i-tus), n. [L., < halare, breathe: see inhale, exhale 1.] In physiol., the breath; also, the vapor exhaled in the cavities of a living and warm body, so long as the blood is warm.—Halitus of the blood (sanguinis), the odorous vapor exhaled by newly drawn blood.

halke, n. [Early mod. E. also halke, haulke; < ME. halke, a corner, recess, < AS. healc, healoc, a hollow. Cf. AS. heal, a corner; holec, holoc, a hollow: see holke. The relations of these forms to one another, and to AS. hoh, hollow, are not clear: see hollow 1.] A nook, corner, recess, or hiding-place.

Imme he com unto a privy halke.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1780.

Read, Where hast thou dwelt, good Geoffrey, al this while.

Unknown to vs, save only by thy bookes?

Chau. In haulks, and herne, God wot, and in exile,

Where none vouchsaf to yeld me words or lookes.

Speght, The Reader to Geoffrey Chaucer (1598).

halket (hal'ket), n. [Origin obscure.] The large gray seal, Halicherus gryphus.

hall (hāl), n. [Early mod. E. also halle; < ME. hale, haulke, < AS. heall, heal = OS. halla = D. MLG. halle = OHG. halla, MHG. halle (G. halle, revived after E.) = Icel. höll (often spelled hall, without umlaut) = Sw. hall = Dan. hal (cf. OF. hale, F. halle = It. alla, < MHG.), a hall, applied in early use to any large room, with closed or open sides; prob. lit. 'a cover' or place of shelter, from the root of AS. helan, ME. helen, E. heal, cover: see heal 2, conceal.] 1. A building, or a large room or compartment in a building, devoted to some public or common use: in various special applications. See below.

When he was at London, a hauke he did vp wright.
First thought & founden, for chambere was it right.

Robert of Brunne, p. 88.

Then ye souldiers of the debite toke Jesus vnto the comon hall and gathered vnto hym all the companye.

Bible of 1551, Mat. xxvii. 27.

Specifically—(a) In medieval palaces and castles, the main room, often the living-room. Besides the hall, in very early times, even in the greatest houses, there were only a few sleeping-rooms, and not always these. In such a hall the lord and his family, retainers, servants, and visitors were all accommodated, and all public and household affairs were carried on. Later rooms more retired were added, but throughout the feudal period the hall remained the common center of activity. Westminster Hall in London was originally a part of the royal palace, where all the common life of the royal court was conducted and the king dispensed justice. This great room continued to be the principal seat of justice in England till 1820.

Ful sooty was hire boor and eek hire halle.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 12.

The great (Westminster) Hall was built by William Rufus, or possibly rebuilt; a room of that description being too necessary an appendage to a palace ever to have been neglected.

Pennant, London, p. 114.

Hence—(b) In Great Britain: (1) A manor-house; the proprietor's residence on a large landed estate: also to some extent an American use, especially in the South.

Kate, the prettiest Kate in Christendom, Kate of Kate Hall.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1.

So pass I hostel, hall, and grange,
By bridge and ford, by park and pale.

Tennyson, Sir Galahad.

(2) The public or common room of a manor-house, serving as a general meeting- and reception-room, and in which justices' courts were formerly held. (3) A mercantile building or room for the sale of particular articles or goods on account of their owners or producers; a place of sale or of business for a trade or guild: as, a hardware hall; Goldsmiths' Hall or Stationers' Hall in London.

To Loriners' [Bit-makers'] Hall, by Mooregate, a hall I never heard of before.
Pepys, Diary, III. 443.

As regards silver-plate, the Hall in London refuses to stamp any poorer alloy.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 71.

(c) An edifice in which courts of justice are held or legal archives are preserved: as, Westminster Hall; the Hall of Records in New York.

1 Gent. Whither away so fast?
2 Gent. . . . Even to the hall, to hear what shall become

Of the great duke of Buckingham.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 1.

(d) A room or building devoted to public business or entertainment, or to meetings of public or corporate bodies: as, a town hall; an association hall; a music-hall. (e) The main building of a college, and in some instances, as at Oxford and Cambridge in England, the specific name of a college. The number of colleges called halls (a term which, as well as house, was originally applied to the residence of the college scholars) in these universities, once considerable, is now small and diminishing.

In colleges and halls, in ancient days, . . .
There dwelt a sage call'd Discipline.

Cowper, Task, ii. 609.

Halls, or places of licensed residence for students, also began to be established [in the thirteenth century].

Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 337.

(f) In English colleges: (1) The large room in which the students dine in common. Hence—(2) The students' dinner.

Hall lasts about three quarters of an hour. Two Scholars conclude the performances by reading a long Latin grace.

C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 37.

Hall is at five o'clock. Macmillan's Magazine.

(g) In American colleges: (1) A room or building appropriated to the meetings of a literary or other society; also, the society itself.

These (Clio and Whig Halls in the College of New Jersey) were the prototypes, and are the most vigorous survivals, of what, for nearly a century, were the most flourishing and numerous of student societies—the twin literary societies, or halls, generally secret, and always intense in mutual rivalry, which have been institutions at every leading college in the land.

The Century, XXXVI. 751.

(2) One of the buildings in which students sleep; a dormitory.

2. An entranceway or passageway in a house leading to or communicating with its different parts.

Anne ran up the path toward the front door, and entered the dark hall. C. F. Woolson, Anne, i.

A hall! a hall! an exclamation formerly used at masks or other entertainments in order to make room in a crowd for an exhibition or a dance, or to call people together for any ceremony or spectacle, or to summon servants: equivalent to a ring! a ring! as now used.

A hall, a hall! whist, still be mum,
For now with silver song they come.

Chapman, Gentleman Usher, ii. 1.

A hall! a hall! who's without, there? [Enter two or three with cushions.] Come on; y' are proper grooms, are ye not? . . . Their honours are upon coming, and the room not ready. Chapman, Widow's Tears.

The Monarch lightly turned away,
And to his nobles loud did call—Lords, to the dance—a hall! a hall!

Scott, Marmion, v. 17.

Apothecaries' Hall. See apothecary.—Bachelor's or bachelor hall, an establishment presided over by a man (especially an unmarried man) or by men only.

The dishes having been set upon the table by a slipshod old woman, they were left to enjoy it [dinner] after their own manner. "Bachelor's Hall, you know, cousin," said Mr. Jonas. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xi.

Divinity hall. See divinity.—Hall of Eblis. See Eblis.—Liberty hall, a place where every one can do as he likes.

Gentlemen, pray be under no restraint in this house; this is Liberty-Hall, gentlemen; you may do just as you please here. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, ii.

hallabaloo (hal' a-ba-lō'), n. Same as hullabaloo. hallage (hāl'āj), n. [= F. hallage; < hall + -age.] In Great Britain, the toll paid for goods or merchandise vended in a mercantile hall.

hallan (hal' an), n. [Also hallen, hallon, halland; origin uncertain; perhaps orig. applied to the stone at the threshold; cf. Sw. häll, a flat stone, Goth. hallus, a rock.] A partition between the door of a cottage and the fireplace, serving to shelter the inner part of the house from the cold air when the door is opened. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

He lifted the latch without ceremony, and . . . found himself behind the hallan or partition.

Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xii.

hallanshaker (hal' an-shā'kér), n. A beggar who stands shivering at the hallan, waiting for alms; a beggarly knave; a low fellow. [Scotch.]

Tho' I were a laird of tencore acres, Nodding to jouks of hallanshakiers. Ramsay.

hall-Bible (hāl'bi'bl), n. A large Bible used for family worship, and kept in the hall or principal apartment of the house. [Scotch.]

The sire turns o'er, wi' patriarchal grace,
The big ha'-bible, ance his father's pride.

Burns, Cottar's Saturday Night.

hall-day†, n. A court-day. Nares.

An hall day: a court day: a day of pleading, as in terme time at Westminster hall, &c. Nomenclator (1535).

hallectret, halecuret (hal'e-kret), n. [OF. hallectret, halecuret, alecuret, allectret, alacret, aloret = Bret. hallectret (Roquefort); of uncertain origin.] A corselet, or a partial suit of armor, in use toward the end of the sixteenth century. It is defined by Cotgrave as "a corselet." According to Meyrick (approved by Burgess and Cosson, Arch. Jour., XXXVII.), the hallectret was a half-suit of light plate-armor worn alike by footmen and horsemen, furnished with long tassels. According to Demmin, it was a gorget with epaulières attached.

Hall effect. See effect.

hälléfínta (hel-e-fin'tä), n. [Sw., < häll, dial. hall (= Dan. helle, a boulder, also a slope, declivity, = Norw. hall, a boulder, esp. a small boulder, as a cobblestone, = Icel. hallr, a stone, boulder, also a slope, declivity, = Goth. hallus, a rock), + flinta, etc., = E. flint.] A very fine-grained variety of gneiss, generally free from mica: a Swedish term. It is sometimes banded and sometimes porphyritic. It resembles many rocks elsewhere called exirite and Jelsite.

The general aspect of this rock recalls to my mind those hälléfíntas of Treffargen and Roche Castle.

Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 223.

hälléfíntoid (hel-e-fin'toid), a. [hälléfínta + -oid.] Of or resembling hälléfínta.

The great hälléfíntoid mass which . . . forms the western slopes of Brynlan Bangor.

hallel (hal'el), n. [Heb., praise.] In Jewish ritual, the hymn of praise, beginning in the original with the word halleluiah, 'Praise ye the Lord,' and consisting of Psalms cxlii. to cxviii. inclusive, chanted in the temple while the Passover lambs were being slain, and also at the Passover supper. This hallel or song of praise, called the Egyptian hallel because the slaying of the Passover lambs was first commanded in Egypt, was also chanted at the sacrifice on the first day of the Passover, after the morning sacrifice on the feast of Pentecost, on the eight days of the feast of Tabernacles, and on the eight days of the feast of the Dedication. Another, called the great hallel, consisting of Psalm cxxxix, or according to some of Psalm cxxxix. 4 to the end of Psalm cxxxix, was chanted by those who wished a fifth cup at the Passover feast, and also on occasions of great joy.

halleluiah, hallelujah (hal'-ē-lō'yä), interj. [Also alleluia; < LL. hallelujah, alleluiah, after Gr. ἁλληλουία, repr. Heb. hallelujäh, praise ye Jehovah, < halelu, praise ye < hālāl, shine, which in one 'voice' (stem) means 'praise'), + Jäh, a short form of Jehovah: see Jehovah. The j or i represents the consonant yodh, equiv. to the E. consonant y; so in other words of Heb. origin, as proper names, where, however, j has conformed in sound to the assimilated j of L. or F. origin, as Jehovah, Jesus, Joseph, Jordan, etc.]

1. Praise ye the Lord: a word used in songs of praise or pious rejoicing, or in solemn ascriptions of thanksgiving to God. It is also used as a noun. It occurs in the English Bible only in Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6, and then in the Greek form, as alleluia. This is the form employed in liturgical usage. It is found in liturgical and offices from very early times. Its most prominent liturgical use is that after the epistle and before the gospel in both the Eastern and Western churches. (See gradual and jubilation.) In the Mozarabic rite it follows the gospel. (See Lauda.) There are probably traces of an original, perhaps Jewish, use of halleluiah before and after psalms. The Greek Church has a triple "Alleluia" at the end of the cherubic hymn. In the day-hours of the same church it is said after the Gloria at the end of stases or portions of psalms. In the Western Church it succeeds the Gloria after the versicles at the beginning of the several hours. In Western usage alleluia is not said from Septuagesima to Easter eve.

I heard a great voice of many people in heaven, saying, Alleluia; Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord our God. Rev. xix. 1.

Angels peep round to view this mystick thing,

And Halleluiah round, all Halleluiah sing.

Conley, Davidels, ii.

And the empyrean rung with Halleluiah.

Milton, P. L., vii. 634.

2. Specifically, a musical composition wholly or principally based upon the word halleluiah: as, the Halleluiah (chorus) in Handel's "Messiah" or in Beethoven's "Mount of Olives."—Common halleluiah meter. Same as common long meter (which see, under common).

halleluiah, hallelujah (hal'-ē-lō'yä), n. 1. See halleluiah, interj.—2. In bot., same as alleluia, 2.

halleluatiac, hallelujatic (hal'-ē-lō-yat'ik), a. [LL. hallelujaticus (sc. psalmus), containing *halleluiah*s, < halleluiah, hallelujah, q. v.] Of or pertaining to the halleluiah. Also alleluatiac.—Halleluatiac sequence, the hymn beginning with the words, "The strain upraise of joy and praise."

hallen (hal'en), n. See hallan.

Halleria (ha-lē'ri-ä), n. [NL., named in honor of Albrecht von Haller (1708-77), a German botanist and physiologist.] A genus of shrubs, of the natural order Scrophulariaceae, having opposite leaves, a cup-shaped calyx, short-lobed red corolla, exserted stamens, and an indehiscent berry-like fruit. It embraces 8 species, natives of South Africa, Madagascar, and Abyssinia. One of these, H. lucida, of the Cape of Good Hope, is known as the white olive or African fly-banana. It is an evergreen shrub, 12 to 14 feet in height and 6 to 8 inches in diameter. The wood is fine-grained, hard, and tough, and is used for wagon-tongues, planes, screws, joiners' benches, etc.

Halleriaceae (ha-lē-ri-ä'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Link, 1829), < Halleria + -aceae.] A division of the Scrophulariaceae or figwort family of plants, embracing the genus Halleria only.

Halleriæ (hal'-ē-ri'-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Don, 1838), < Halleria + -æ.] Same as Halleriaceae.

hall-house (hāl'hous), n. A manor-house; the habitation of a landed proprietor.

There were mair fules in the laird's ha'-house than Davie Gellatley. Scott, Waverley, x.

hallian, n. See hailion.

halliard, n. See halyard.

hallidomet, n. Same as halidom. Spenser.

hallier†, n. [hall + -ier.] A university student belonging to a hall.

The students also that remaine in them are called hostellers or halliers. Holinshed, Descrip. of Eng., iii.

hallier² (hāl'ier), n. [For halier*, < halel, haul, + *-ier*¹. Cf. haler, hauler.] 1. One who hales or hauls, as for hire. [Prov. Eng.]-2. A kind of net for catching birds.

halling† (hāl'ing), n. [hall + *-ing*¹.] A suit of hangings, tapestry, or the like, for a hall.

Where the sayd thre kynges sat crowned all,

The best hallynge hanged as reason was,

Whereon were wrought the ix orders angelical.

Bradshaw, tr. of Life of St. Werburgh.

halling² (hāl'ing), n. [Norw.] 1. A Norwegian country-dance in triple rhythm.—2. Music for such a dance.

hailion, hailian (hāl'yōn, -ian), n. [Formerly also hallynge. Origin unknown.] 1. A clown; a rogue; a worthless, idle fellow.

They took their departure, shabby hailions, by a side passage. Carlyle, in Froude.

2. An overbearing, quarrelsome, and vulgar woman. Jamieson.

hall-mark (hāl'märk), n. 1. In England, an official stamp put upon articles made of gold and silver as an evidence of genuineness: so called from Goldsmiths' Hall in London, the seat of the Goldsmiths' Company, by whom the stamping is legally regulated. It consists of various marks placed close together, as follows: (1) the mark indicating the standard, as, for silver of the new standard, a figure of Britannia and a lion's head erased; (2) the mark of the assay-town, as a crown for Sheffield or an anchor for Birmingham; (3) a mark denoting that the duty has been paid; (4) the date-mark, consisting of a letter of the alphabet for each year, in series of differing style or design; (5) the maker's mark, usually two or more initial letters; (6) the workman's mark, which is not always present.

Hence—2. Any mark of genuineness, good quality, or respectability.

And this is the hall-mark of all true science, that it destroys by fulfilling. Nineteenth Century, XIX. 209.

Lander, however, would not admit into his pages any word or phrase which lacked the hall-mark of the best writers. The Literary Era, II. 165.

hall-mark (hāl'märk), v. t. [hall-mark, n.] To assay and stamp, as with the official mark of the Goldsmiths' Company.

Inasmuch as all articles of gold and silver made in London have to be assayed and stamped at Goldsmiths' Hall, the assay-marks have come to be called "hall-marks." The term has become so popular that a factious writer in the Quarterly Review, April, 1888 (p. 281), speaks of the Council of Trent as "hall-marking" the Vulgate.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 167.

Guaranteeing of quality by inspection has been shown, in the hall-marking of silver, to be superfluous, while the silver trade has been deceived by it.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 57.

hallmote, n. [ME. law-term, < hall + mote, ME. form of AS. gemōt, E. moot, a meeting.] In England, a court held in a justice's hall; a court-leet: now called a court-baron.

The manor of Colne comprises the township of Colne, the forest of Trawden, and the township of Foulridge; and for this tract two hallmote or leet courts are held on behalf of the lord, the duke of Buccleuch, yearly.

Baines, Hist. Lancashire, II. 27.

He was a fellow of infinite humour, and performed his duties to his lord and the hallmote jury as if to the manner born.

Quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 4.

hallo (ha-lō'), interj. [In early mod. E. also written hallow, halow, alow, and even a lo; ME. halow; in mod. E. also hello, hullo, and halloo, q. v. Such forms, being mere syllables to call attention, are freely varied for sonorous effect; hallo, hello, halloo, may be regarded as the mod. representatives of the common AS. ed lā or edā, used similarly to call attention, whether loudly from afar, like hallo, hello, halloo, or quietly from near by, like hello colloquially, or like mod. ah, oh, well, and similar preliminary syllables. AS. edā represents E. ah or oh, and lā is E. lo. These forms, in hunting use, are represented by OF. halle, an interjection of cheering or setting on of a dog, mod. F. haler, set (dogs upon one), encourage with shouts. So G. hallo, halloh, perhaps after the E. The form hallow, as a noun or verb, with accent on the first syllable, is a var. of hollow, hollo; holla, now scarcely used as an interj., and is in so far different from hallo, hello: see holla, hollow², etc. Cf. hallabalo, hullabalo, etc., F. hallali, a hunting-cry, etc.] An exclamation used to call attention: same as hello, hullo, now more common colloquially, and as halloo, which differs more in pronunciation and use. See hello and halloo.

halloo (ha-lō'), interj. [A sonorous variant of hallo, suited to a prolonged cry intended to be heard at a distance.] An exclamation used to call the attention of a person at a distance, or in hunting to incite the dogs.

Pillicock sat on pillicock hill;—

Halloo, halloo, loo, loo! Shak, Lear, iii. 4.

Some popular chief,
More noisy than the rest, but cries halloo,
And, in a trice, the bellowing herd come out.

Dryden.

Halloo, my fancie, halloo!
Stay, stay at home with me;
I can thee no longer follow,
For thou hast betrayed me
And bewrayed me!
It is too much for thee.

W. Cleland (?), Halloo, my Fancie.

halloo (ha-lō'), v. [cf. halloo, interj. Cf. hallo, hollo, hollow².] I. intrans. To cry out; call with a loud voice; shout; cry, as after dogs.

Country folks halloed and hooted after me. Sidney.
I knocked at various doors, and halloed loudly, until a sleepy farmer made his appearance.

B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 394.

II. trans. 1. To call or shout to; incite or chase with shouts and cries of "Halloo!"

Old John halloos his hounds again. Prior, Alma, ii.

Hallow-day (hal'ō-dā), n. All Saints' day.

This night is Hallowe'en, Janet,

The morn is Hallowday.

The Young Tamlane (Child's Ballads, l. 120).

Hallowe'en, Hallow-ee (hal'ō-ēn', -ēv'), n.

[Also written Halloween; short for Allhallowe'en, etc., All-hallows' even: see all-hallows, All-hallowen, All-hallon, etc. Cf. Hallowmas.]

The evening of October 31st, as the eve or vigil of All-hallows or All Saints' day.

Hallowe'en is an occasion of certain popular superstitions and observances in many Christian countries, fairies, witches, and imps of all kinds being supposed to be then especially active.

In Scotland, as related in Burns's "Hallowe'en," the evening is frequently celebrated by meetings of young people of both sexes, when various mystical or playful ceremonies are performed with the view of revealing future husbands or wives. The form Hallow-even is rare.

"This night is hallow-ee," he said,

"And to-morrow is hallow-day."

Sir Roland (Child's Ballads, l. 224).

Some merry, friendly country folks

Together did convene,

To burn their nits, and pou their stocks,

An' haud their Halloween. Burns, Halloween.

Hallow-fair (hal'ō-fāir), n. [cf. hallow¹, n. (with ref. to Hallow-ee, All-hallows), + fair².] A market held in November. [Scotch.]

Hallowmas, Hallowmass (hal'ō-mas), n.

[Short for All-hallows' mass, AS. ealra hālgena mæsse-dæg, all saints' mass-day. Cf. Hallowe'en, All-hallows, etc.] The feast of All Saints; All Saints' day, namely, the 1st of November.

I beseech you, look into master Froth here, sir; a man of fourscore pound a-year; whose father died at Hallowmas. Was 't not at Hallowmas, master Froth?

Shak, M. for M., ii. 1.

Hallow-tide (hal'ō-tid), n. [Short for Allhallow-tide, ME. alle halowene tide: see Allhallow-tide.] Same as Allhallow-tide.

halloysite (ha-loi'zīt), n. [Named after J. B. J. d'Omalius d'Halloy (1783-1875), a Belgian geologist.] A clay-like, earthy mineral with waxy or dull luster, white or slightly colored, and having a conchoidal fracture. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminum.

hallucal (hal'ū-kal), a. [cf. halluc (halluc) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the hallux: as, hallucal muscles; the hallucal or accessory metatarsal of a bird.

halluces, n. Plural of hallux.

hallucinate (ha-lū'si-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. hallucinated, pp. hallucinating. [L. hallucinatus, allucinatus, better alucinatus, pp. of hallucinari, alucinari, better alucinari, wander in mind, dream, talk idly, prate.] I. t. intrans. To blunder.

The very consideration of human infirmity is not sufficient to excuse such teachers of others, who hallucinate or prevaricate in this.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 122.

Adorning richly, for the poet's sake,

Some poor hallucinating scribe's mistake.

Byrom, Epistle to a Friend.

II. trans. To affect with hallucination.

But my subject C, although he could easily be hallucinated in any desired way, seemed always very drowsy and slow of response during his trance.

Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 243, note.

The hallucinated person not only imagined such and such a thing, but imagined that he saw such and such a thing. E. Gurney, Eng. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 155.

hallucination (ha-lū'si-nā'shon), n. [= F. hallucination = Sp. alucinación = Pg. alucinação = It. alucinazione, < L. hallucinatio (-n-), alucinatio (-n-), better alucinatio (-n-), < alucinari, wander in mind, dream, talk idly: see hallucinate.]

1. An unfounded notion; belief in an unreality; a baseless or distorted conception.

This must have been the hallucination of the transcriber, who probably mistook the dash of the I for a T. Addison.

2. In pathol. and psychol., the apparent perception of some external thing to which no real object corresponds. The mistaking of a bush for a bear in the dark is not hallucination, but only illusion; but the hearing of a voice when no sensible acoustic vibrations strike the ear is a very common hallucination. Hallucination may be of sight only, or of hearing only, or of both together. It may be consistent with perfect sanity and the absence of any false belief, and may even become an object of observation and study to the person affected.

For if vision be abolished, it is called cœcitas, or blindness; if depraved, and receive its objects erroneously, hallucination. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 18.

Illusion and hallucination shade one into the other much too gradually for us to draw any sharp line of demarcation between them. J. Sulz, Illusions, p. 111.

Hallucinations of the senses are first distinguished from other hallucinations by the fact that they do not necessarily imply any false belief.

E. Gurney, Eng. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 151.

During the operation my chamber was filled with human figures of all kinds. This hallucination continued uninterruptedly till half after four, at which time digestion commenced. Nicolaï, tr., in Nicholson's Journal.

= Syn. Delusion, Illusion (see delusion); phantasm.

hallucinator (ha-lū'si-nā-tor), n. [cf. LL. hallucinator, alucinator, < alucinari: see hallucinate.] One who acts under hallucination; a blunderer. North British Rev. [Rare.]

hallucinatory (ha-lū'si-nā-tō-ri), a. [cf. hallucinate + -ory.] Partaking of or producing hallucination.

Hallucinatory portraits are seen on blank cards, or on cards already photographed with entirely different faces. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 498.

A prism placed before the more normal eye doubles the hallucinatory image, and makes one of the images undergo a deviation in conformity to the laws of optics. Mind, IX. 414.

haluf (hal'uf), n. [Abyssinian.] Ælian's warty-hog, Phacochoerus æliani. Also called Abyssinian phacochoere, Ethiopian wild boar, and haraja.

See wart-hog.

hallux (hal'uks), n.; pl. halluces (-ū-sēz). [NL., altered from LL. hallex, or rather allex, the great toe, found earlier in fig. sense, L. allex, 'thumbing,' a term of contempt for a little man.] The innermost of the five digits which normally compose the hind foot of air-breathing vertebrates; in man, the great toe. See cut under foot.

It is the correlative of pollex, the corresponding digit of the hand. In ornithology it is the digit of the fewest joints, when there are four digits: in birds with three toes in front and one behind it is the hind one; in birds with four digits, all in front, it is the inner one; in birds with four digits, two behind and two before, it is the inner hind one, except in the trogons, where it is the outer hind one; in nearly all birds with three or two digits it is wanting. See cut under bird.

But the hind toe, or hallux, . . . requires special notice, as it is important in classification. The insertion of this digit varies, from the very bottom of the tarsus (metatarsus) . . . to some distance up the bone.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 128.

hallway (hāl'wā), n. An entrance-hall or a passage between rooms in a dwelling or other building.

halm, haulm (hām), n. [Early mod. E. also harum, havume; < ME. halm, < AS. healm, the stem or stalk of grass, grain, etc., straw (cf. healm-stredu, straw, stubble), = OS. halm = D. MLG. halm = OHG. halm, MHG. halm, halme, G. halm = Icel. hālmr, stem, stalk, straw, = Sw. Dan. halm, straw, = L. culmus, a stalk (> E. *culm*², q. v.) = Gr. κάλυπος (> L. calamus, a reed: see calamus), καλῆμ, a stalk of corn, = Skt. kalama, a reed, = O.Bulg. slama, a stalk; allied to L. culmen, the highest point (> ult. E. culminate, etc.), culmen, top, summit, columna, a pillar (> E. column, colonnade, colonel, etc.), from the root of cellere, raise, pp. celsum, high, in comp. excellere, raise, be eminent, > E. excel, q. v.] 1. The stem or stalk of grain of any kind, and of peas, beans, hops, etc.

A fog . . . of rushes, and flood-wood, and wild-celery haulm, and dead crow's-foot.

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, x.

2. Straw; the dry stalks of corn, etc., in general.—3. In England, especially, a kind of grass, Amophilla arundinacea or Psamma arenaria. Also called maram, matweed, and stare. See Amophilla.

halmalille (hāl'mā-lil), n. [E. Ind.] A valuable tree, Berrya amomilla, abundant in Ceylon, and also widely dispersed throughout tropical Asia and Australia. It is the only species of the genus, and belongs to the natural order Tiliaceae, being allied to the hinden-tree. The wood is much used in boat-building, as it is believed to resist the attack of marine worms, and also, by a certain oleaginous property, to preserve the iron from corrosion. It is exported from Ceylon to Madras, and used in building the Masula boats adapted to the heavy surf of that coast. Its light wood is there known as Trincomali-wood. It is also used in Ceylon in house-building, etc.

Halmaturidæ (hal-ma-tū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halmaturus + -idæ.] A family of kangaroos, taking name from the genus Halmaturus. See Macropodidæ. Bonaparte, 1831.

halmatourous (hal-ma-tū'rus), a. [< NL. Halmaturus, q. v.] Leaping with the assistance of the tail: an epithet of the kangaroos.

Halmaturus (hal-ma-tū'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. άλμα (-r-), a spring, leap (< ἀλλεσθαι, spring, leap), + οὐρά, tail.] A genus of kangaroos, of the family Macropodidæ, comprising the ordi-lished by Kützing in 1843, the type of his family Halochloæ. It is characterized by fronds articulated at the base and provided with distinct leaves, solitary petioled conceptacles, the angiosperms located in the peripheral portion, and distinct petioled aërocytes crowned with leaflets. Lindley reduced this genus to a section of Sargassum.

Halochloæ (ha-lok'lo-ē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Halochloa.] A family of algae established by Kützing in 1843, coming under his tribe Angiospermeæ, of the class Isocarpeæ, and having the genus Halochloa as the type. It is now embraced in the Fuaceæ.

Halodroma (ha-lo-drō-mā), n. [NL., equiv. to Hali-dromus*, < Gr. ἡλιδρομος, running over the sea, < ἄλς, the sea, + δρομεῖν, run.] The typical genus of petrels of the subfamily Halodrominæ. Pelecanoioides is a synonym of prior date. Illiger, 1811. Also written Haladroma.

halodrome (hal'ō-drōm), n. A bird of the genus Halodroma. Also written haladrome.

Halodrominæ (ha-lo-drō-mī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Halodroma + -inæ.] An aberrant subfamily of Procellariidæ, having short wings and tail as in diving birds, tridactyl feet, the nasal tubes vertical instead of horizontal, and a rudimentary gular pouch. Halodroma is the typical and only genus. The species are found in southern seas, and resemble ants rather than petrels. The subfamily is also known as the family Pelecanoididæ.

halogen (hal'ō-jen), n. [= F. halogène, < Gr. ἄλς, salt, + -γενεῖν, producing: see -gen.] In chem., an element that forms a compound of a saline nature by its direct union with a metal. The halogens are chlorine, iodine, bromine, and fluorine, to which cyanogen may be added as a compound halogen.

halogenia (hal'ō-jē-nī-ā), n. [NL.: see halogen.] Same as halogen.

halogenous (ha-loj'e-nus), a. [As halogen + -ous.] Having the nature of halogens; generating saline compounds.

halography (ha-log'ra-fī), n. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A description of salts. Thomas.

haloid (hā'lōid), a. and n. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + ειδός, form.] I. a. In chem., like sea-salt: applied to all those compounds which consist of a metal directly united to chlorine, bromine, iodine, cyanogen, or fluorine. They are distinguished by the name of haloid salts because in constitution they are all similar to sea-salt.

There is a class of bodies, the haloid ethers, which stand in nearly the same relation to the corresponding hydrogen compounds as benzoënitrite to hydrocyanic acid. E. Frankland, Exper. in Chemistry, p. 36.

II. n. A haloid salt.

Also spelled haloide.

halomancy (hal'ō-man-sī), n. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + μαντεία, divination: see mantis.] Divination in some manner by means of salt. Also written, less properly, alomancy.

halones, n. Plural of halo, 4.

Halonia (ha-lō'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλονία, a threshing-floor, < ἄλος. See halo.] A name given by Lindley and Hutton to a fossil found in the coal-measures, in regard to the nature and affinities of which there has been much discussion. It is now known to be a fruiting branch of Lepidodermis (which see).

halophilous (ha-lof'i-lus), a. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + φιλος, loving.] In bot., preferring or habitually growing in soil impregnated with salt, or various salts, as maritime plants.

halophyte (hal'ō-fit), n. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + φυτόν, a plant.] The saltwort, a plant, such as those of the genera Salicornia, Salsola, and Suaeda, inhabiting salt marshes and sea-coasts. The ash after burning contains barilla and other salts.

Haloragacæ (hal'ō-rā-gā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Haloragis + -acæ.] An order of plants established by Lindley in 1846, including the Haloragæ as now defined and also the genus Trapa.

Haloragæ (hal'ō-rā'jē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Haloragis + -æ.] A natural order of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, characterized by small, often incomplete 2- to 4-merous flowers, inferior 1- to 4-celled ovary, with as many distinct styles, solitary pendulous ovules, and fleshy albumen. They consist largely of aquatic herbs, the genera Hippuris, Myriophyllum, Proserpinaca, and Calitriche being represented in North America. The order was originally established by Robert Brown, in 1814, as a series of the Onagraceæ. The term is also written by different authors Haloragaceæ, Haloragidæ, and Haloragidæ.

Haloragis (hal'ō-rā'jis), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + ράς, a berry.] The typical genus of the natural order Haloragæ, founded by John and George Forster in 1776, consisting of about 40 species of plants, chiefly Australasian, a few occurring in India and China, and one on the island of Juan Fernandez. The genus is botanically characterized by the possession of 4 petals, 8 stamens, a 1- to 4-celled ovary with from 2 to 4 ovules in each cell, and plumose stigmas. The plants are chiefly low terrestrial herbs with small leaves, and bear inconspicuous axillary flowers which are sometimes unisexual, the pistillate (female) flowers in such cases being generally apetalous. Two Australian species, H. alata and H. tetragyna, are cultivated under the name of seaberry.

halosaurian (hal'ō-sā'ri-an), n. [As Halosaurus + -ian.] An extinct marine saurian, as an ichthyosaur or a plesiosaur.

The Halosaurus, with their best known genera, Ichthyosaurus and Plesiosaurus, are entirely peculiar to the secondary period. Claus, Zoology (trans.), p. 177.

Halosauridæ (hal'ō-sā'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halosaurus + -idæ.] A family of teleostean fishes having the body entirely covered by cycloid scales, the margin of the upper jaw formed by the intermaxillaries mesially and by the maxillaries laterally, the opercular apparatus incomplete, the gill-openings wide, and the ovaries closed. They are of an elongated form, with a tapering pointed tail, no caudal fin, no adipose fin, a small short dorsal fin, a very long anal fin, and a scaly head without barbels.

Halosaurus (hal'ō-sā'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] The typical genus of Halosauridæ. H. macrochir is a deep-sea Atlantic species about 2 feet long. Johnson, 1863.

haloscope (hal'ō-skōp), n. [< Gr. ἅλως, a halo, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument invented by M. Beauvais which exhibits the phenomena connected with halos, parhelia, and the like.

halotrichite (ha-lof'ri-ki-tē), n. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + τρίχης (trichis), hair, + -ite.] 1. An iron alum found in silky fibrous aggregations.—2. Same as alumogen.

haloxylin (ha-lok'si-lin), n. [< Gr. ἄλς, salt, + ξύλον, wood, + -in.] A mixture of yellow prussiate of potassa, niter, and charcoal, used as an explosive.

halpt, halpet. Obsolete preterits of help.

halpacet, n. See hautepace.

halse† (hāls), n. [Now usually written hawse; a particular use of halse†, the neck, but in this use of Scand. origin; < Icel. hals, the neck, part of the fore-castle or bow of a ship or boat, the front sheet of a sail, the tack of a sail, the end of a rope, etc., = Sw. Dan. hals, the neck, tack, etc.: see halse†, and cf. halse† and halser, hawser.] An obsolete form of hawse†.

halse† (hāls), v. t. [In another form hailse, of Scand. origin (see hailse); < ME. halsen, hal-sien, beseech, adjure, < AS. hālsian, beseech, Brush-kangaroo, or Black Wallabee (Halmaturus walabatus).

nary brush-kangaroos, wallabees, or pademelons, which have a naked muffle. Most of the species of the family belong to this genus, and are of moderate or small size. Such are H. antilopinus, H. bennetti, H. thersites, and others. The range of the genus includes Tasmania and New Guinea as well as Australia. It was founded by Illiger in 1811.

hallmote, n. See hallmote.

halo (hā'lō), n. [In ME. hale; = F. halo = Sp. halo, halon = Pg. halão = It. alone, < L. halos, gen. and acc. halo (= Ar. hēlah = Hind. hālāh, a halo), < Gr. ἅλως, gen. and acc. ἅλω, Epic ἅλω, a threshing-floor (on which the oxen trod out a circular path), hence the round disk of the sun or moon, later a halo around them, < ἅλειν, grind.] 1. A luminous circle, either white or colored, seen round the sun or moon, and commonly of 22° or of 46° radius, the definite radii depending on the definite angles of ice-crystals. Sometimes one of these only is seen, and sometimes both appear at the same time. Halos are due to the refraction of light as it passes through minute ice-needles in the atmosphere. They are frequently accompanied by super-numerary circles, parhelia or mock suns, paraselenæ or mock moons, and variously arranged white bands, crosses, or arcs. All of these phenomena are the result of the refraction, reflection, and diffraction of light when it falls upon crystals of ice suspended in the atmosphere. Halos and their attendant phenomena are more frequent in winter than in summer, and are more commonly observed in the arctic regions than in warmer climates.

Halos must not be confounded with coronæ—those concentric rings which encircle the sun or moon when seen through a mist or cloud. Halos, as we have seen, are red inside, coronæ are red outside. The size of the coronæ depends on the size of the drops of water in a mist or cloud, being smaller as the drops are larger. They are due to diffraction, and can only be explained by the help of the undulatory theory.

Tait, Light, p. 133.

2. A circle of light, as the nimbus surrounding the head of a saint. See nimbus.—3. A brownish circle round the nipple; an areola.—4. [NL.] Pl. halones (hal'ō-nēz). In ornith., certain chiefly concentric rings of color in the yolk of an egg: an optical appearance due to the deposition of the yolk in successive layers or strata.—5. Figuratively, an ideal glow or glory investing an object as viewed through the medium of feeling or sentiment.

The past always comes to us with a halo.

S. Bouvies, in Merriam, II. 423.

halo (hā'lō), v. [< halo, n.] I. intrans. To form a halo. [Rare.]

His gray hairs
Curled like to the fire
That haloed round his saintly brow.

Southey, Thalaba, ix.

II. trans. To surround with a halo.

The fact that a man is not yet haloed with the light that comes only when, in death or in hoary age, he recalls to us the past, need not debar him from full recognition.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 410.

Halobates (ha-lob'a-tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς (in comp. ἅλω and ἅλω), the sea, + βάτης, one that treads, < βαίνειν, go, walk, tread.] A genus of heteropterous insects, of the family Nepidæ: so called because the species are found on the surface of the sea. These bugs are truly pelagic. They are properly tropical and subtropical, but occur in great numbers on the tracts of sargassum, by which they are carried far north and south. Straggling specimens have been found as far north as North Carolina. Eschscholtz.

Halochloa (ha-lok'lo-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλς, the sea, + χλόν, verdure.] A genus of algae estabadjure, exorcise, = OHG. heilōn, MHG. heil- sen, predict (by omens), < Icel. heilsa = Sw.

helsa = Dan. hilsa, greet, hail; with verb-formative
 -s (as in AS. blētsian, ONorth. bloedsia, E. bless, q. v., likewise of religious origin), <
 AS. hāl (= OHG. heil = Icel. heil, etc.), whole, hale, safe: see *halt*², *halē*², whole. Hence hal- sen, halseny, hazeny, hazon, etc.] 1. To greet; salute; hail.—2. To beseech; adjure.

This yonge child to conjure he bigan,
 And seyde, O dere child, I halse thee,
 In vertu of the holy Trinite,
 Tel me what is thy cause for to synge.

Chaucer, Frioresse's Tale, l. 193.

He halsed hit thorow goddes mygte
 That the fende he putte to flygte.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 85.

halse⁴, v. t. [Early mod. E., also written hawse:
 see *hawse*².] Same as *hawse*².

halse-bone (hāl's-bōn), n. [Se. halsbane; < *halse*¹
 + *bone*¹.] The neck-bone.

She pu'd the broom flower on Hive-hill,
 And strew'd o' n's white hals bane.

The Broomfield Hill (Child's Ballads, l. 132).

halsemant, n. An executioner. Hallivell.

The halsman's sword. Cleveland Revived (1660), p. 75.

halsen (hāl'sen), v. [Also halson, halzen; also hazon; a dial. var. or more orig. form of *halse*³,
 q. v.] 1. trans. To predict; promise. Wright.
 [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. To promise; bode; bid (fair or ill). [Prov. Eng.]

This ill halsening horny name (Cornwall) hath (as Cor-nuto in Italy) opened a gap to the scoffes of many.

R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, p. 1 b.

halseny (hāl'sen-i), n.; pl. halsenies (-iz). [Also hazeny, v.; < halsen, v.] 1. A prediction (of evil).—2. Guess; conjecture. [Prov. Eng. in both senses.]

halseri, n. See hawser.

halsiert, n. [*halse*⁴ + *-ier*¹.] Same as halster.

An halster, or he which haleth and draweth a ship or barge alongst the river by a rope: also he that draweth up burthens and packes into the ship. Nomenclator (1655).

halster (hāl'stēr), n. [Cf. halsier.] One who draws a barge along a river by a rope. [Prov.
 Eng.]

halt¹ (hált), v. i. [Early mod. E. also hault; < gihelzan, make lame), < healt, halt, lame: see *halt*¹, a.] 1. To limp; move with a limping gait.

The king would have given unto him Judith, the widow of Earle Waltheofus, but shee refused him because that he halted on the one legge. Stow.

Scarce half made up,
 And that so lamely and unfashionable,
 That dogs bark at me as I halt by them.

Shak., Rich. III., l. 1.

The traveler now, stooping, felt his foot and leg, as if trying whether they were sound; apparently something ailing them, for he halted to the stile whence I had just risen, and sat down. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xii.

2. To stand in doubt; hesitate; linger; delay.

How long halt ye between two opinions? 1 Ki. xviii. 21.

Their religion halteth betwixt divers religions of the Turkes, Persians, and Christians of the Iacobeite and Nestorian Sects. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 343.

Have you perceived my liberalitie or goodnesse, to-wardes you, to halt, to faynt, or to be slacke, at any time, or in any thing? Udall, Flowers for Latin Speaking, fol. 24.

3. To be lame, faulty, or defective, as in connection of ideas, or in measure or versification:
 as, a halting metaphor; a halting sonnet.

The lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt for 't. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

Spenser himself affects the obsolete,
 And Sidney's verse halts ill on Roman feet.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 98.

halt³ (hált), n. [*halt*², v.] 1. The act of limping; lameness; a defect in gait.—2. A disease in sheep.

In cold stiff soils the bleaters oft complain
 Of gouty ails, by shepherds term'd the halt.

Dyer, Fleece, i.

halt² (hált), n. [First in 17th century, also alt (Milton), < OF. halte or halt, stop, stay, = It.

halte or halt, houden, lit. hold, halt, < G. halt, halt, lit. hold, impv. of halten = E. *hold*¹: see *hold*¹, v.] A stop; a suspension of progress in walking, riding, or going in any manner, and especially in marching.

To decry the distant foe,
 Where lodged, or whither fled; or if for fight,
 In motion or in halt.

Milton, P. L., vi. 532.

Among them rose a cry
 As if to greet the king; they made a halt.

Tennyson, Princess, v.

A halt was called at Oxford, with the advance seventeen miles south of there.

U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, l. 432.

halt² (hált), v. [= F. halter, halt; from the noun.] 1. intrans. To stop in walking or going; cease to advance; stop for a longer or shorter time on a march, as a body of troops.

At length prudence and reason cry Halt!
 Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 54.

When we halted at that other well,
 And I was faint to swooning.

Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

II. trans. To bring to a stand; cause to cease marching: as, the general halted his troops.

halt³. A Middle English contraction of halt- eth, equivalent to holdeth, third person singular of the present indicative of *hold*¹.

halter¹ (hál'tēr), n. [ME. halter; < *halt*², v., + *-er*¹.] One who halts or limps; hence,
 one who hesitates as in doubt.

Those halters between two religions think they can do their homage to the true God and to the false.

D. Stokes, Twelve Minor Prophets (1659), p. 412.

halter² (hál'tēr), n. [ME. halter, halter, helfter, < AS. hælfter, healfter, hælftræ (= MD. halfter, halchter, D. halfter, halster = MLG. halter, LG.

 pearing also, with umlaut, in AS. hielf, helf, E. hebbe, a handle, and in AS. helma (for orig. helf-* ma, helbma*), E. helmi, a handle, tiller (see helve and *helm*¹), + suffix -ter.] 1. A rope, cord, or strap having at one end a noose or a head-stall, for leading or confining a horse or other animal.

He took a cowl (calt) halter frae his hose . . .
 And tied it to his gray mare's tale.

Lochnaben Harper (Child's Ballads, VI. 8).

2. A rope specially intended for hanging male-factors; a hangman's noose.

Pitie it is that he prieth a halter so deare, else would he rid the world of a burthen, and himselfe of his worthlesse life. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 325.

Thou musty justice,
 Buy an honourable halter, and hang thyself!

Fletcher and Shirley, Night-Walker, iii. 3.

halter² (hál'tēr), v. t. [*halt*², n.] To put a halter on; catch, hold, or make fast with or as if with a halter: as, to halter a horse.

I have savage cause;
 And to proclaim it civilly, were like
 A halter d'neck, which does the hangman thank

For being yare about him. Shak., A. and C., iii. 11.

What pretty gins thou hast to halter woodcocks!

Fletcher, Wit without Money, iv. 2.

halter³ (hál'tēr), n.; pl. halteres (hál-tē-réz).

[< L. halter, < Gr. άλτήρ, usually in pl. άλτήρες, weights held in the hands to give an impetus in leaping, leaping-weights, < άλλσβα, leap, = L. sal- ire, leap: see salient.]
 In entom., one of the poisers or balancers of insects: usually in the plural.

Flies may be easily recognized by their having but a single pair of wings, the hinder pair being aborted, and existing in a rudimentary state under the name of halter.

A. S. Packard, Study of Insects, p. 358.

Halterata (hál-tē-rā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of halteratus: see halterate.] The order of insects now called Diptera. Scopoli, 1763.

halterate (hál-tē-rāt), a. [*halt*², v. + *-er*¹.] Having halteres, as a dipterous insect; specifically, pertaining to the Halterata.

halter-break (hál'tēr-brāk), v. t. To accustom to the use of a halter; break or train by means of a halter, as a colt.

Always halterbreak colts to go beside their mothers.
New York Semi-weekly Tribune, Dec. 24, 1898.

halteres, n. Plural of *halter*³.
Halteria (hál-tē-rī-ā), n. [NL., < L. halter, < Gr. άλτήρ, a leaping-weight: see *halter*³.] The typical genus of Halteriidae, having the peristome spirally involute, the mouth eccentric, and a girdle of supplementary springing-hairs.
 They are very minute, but may be recognized by their globose form and slow rocking or lagging motions, interrupted at times by quick skipping. They are found only in fresh water. H. grandinella is an example.

Halteriidae (hál-tē-rī-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hal- teria + -idae.] A family of free-swimming animalcules, typified by the genus Halteria.

Halterina (hál-tē-rī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Halteria
 + -ina.] A family of ciliate infusorians, represented by the genera Halteria and Strombidium.
Claparède and Lachmann, 1858-60.

Halteriptera (hál-tē-rīp'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL., <
 L. halter, Gr. άλτήρ, a leaping-weight, + πτερόν, wing.] The order of insects now called Dip- tera. Clairville, 1798.

halteripterous, a. [See Halteriptera.] Having halteres, as a dipterous insect; specifically, pertaining to the Halteriptera.

haltermant (hál'tēr-mān), n. A hangman.

It is an ill wind that blows no man to good, for halter- men and ballet-makers were not better set a-worke this many a day. Bundle of New Wit (1638).

haltersack (hál'tēr-sak), n. One who is fit for the gallows; a hangdog; a gallows-bird.

A knavish lad, a sile wag, a haltersack. Florio, p. 81.

I would hang him up by the heels, and flay him, and salt him, whoreson halter-sack.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, i. 4.

Haltica (hál'ti-kā), n. [NL., < Gr. άλτικός, leaping, < άλσβα, leap: see *halter*³.] A genus of flea-beetles, referred to the Chrysomelidae or Galerucidae, or made type of a family Halticidae. The turnip-flea or turnip-fly, H. nemorum, destructive at times to turnip-crops, is an example.
 Another species, H. consobrina, attacks cabbage. The cucumber flea-beetle, H.
cucumeris, is one of the commonest in the United States. Also written Altica.
 See also cut under flea-beetle.

Halticidae (hál'ti-si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haltica
 + -idae.] A family of saltatorial coleopters or jumping beetles, typified by the genus Haltica: the flea-beetles.
 They have thickened hind femora, fitted for leaping, are of small size and often bright-colored, and are especially injurious to cruciferous plants. Also written Halticidae, Halticites.

Halticoptera (hál-ti-kop'tē-rā), n. [NL., fem.
 sing., < Gr. άλτικός, leaping, + πτερόν, wing.]
 A genus of chalcid hymenopters, of the subfamily Pteromalinae, of which the European H. aterrima is the sole species. Spinola, 1811.

Halticoptera (hál-ti-kop'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL.,
 neut. pl.: see *Halticoptera*¹.] A series of genera in Chalcididae proposed by Haliday in 1840.
 [Not in use.]

Halticoidae (hál-ti-kor'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., <
Halticoides + -idae.] A family of jumping bugs, or saltatorial heteropterous insects, typified by the genus Halticoides, and belonging to the superfamily Capsina. Douglas and Scott, 1865.

Halticoris (hál-tik'ō-ris), n. [NL. (Douglas and Scott, 1865), contr. of Halticoides*, < Gr.
άλτικός, leaping (see Haltica), + κόρις, bug.]
 A genus of true bugs, typical of the family Hal- ticoideae, comprising a few European species, as H. palliicornis.

haltingly (hál'ting-lī), adv. In a halting manner; with limping; hesitatingly; slowly.

halvaner, halvanner (hál'vān-ēr), n. [North.
 E., < *halvan*s + *-er*¹.] A miner who dresses or washes halvan-ore. See halvans.

halvan-ore (hál'vān-ōr), n. See halvans.

halvans (hál'vānz), n. pl. [North. E., perhaps for halvens* (cf. halfendeal), < half, q. v.] In mining, the refuse ore, or that from which the best part has been selected. Halvans may be subjected to further culling; and, when this is done, the ore thus obtained is called halvan-ore. In general, the word is a synonym of attle. [Not much used in the United States.]

halve (häv), v. t.; pret. and pp. halved, ppr.
halving. [ME. halven, halfen (= MHG. halben, heiben, G. halben); < half, a.] 1. To divide into two parts, especially two equal parts or halves.

But halve your men in equal parts.
Battle of Philpphaugh (Child's Ballads, VII. 134).

We can no more halve things, and get the sensual good by itself, than we can get an inside that shall have no outside, or a light without a shadow.

Emerson, Compensation.

Portion of an Asilid Fly, showing a, a, Halteres.

2. To join, as two pieces of timber, by cutting away one half or an equal portion in depth of each, so as to let them into each other. This is done to produce either a lap joint, a dovetail, a scarf, or a notched joint or common halving. The upper figure represents the simple lap joint, and the lower one the common halving.

halvet, a. and n. An obsolete variant of half. Chaucer.

halved (hävd), a. In bot., with one half, or nearly so, of a nominally bilateral organ wanting, as in the leaves of some begonias; dimidiate.

halve-net, haave-net (häv'net), n. [Ice. háv'r, a kind of net for herring-fishing, + E. net, n.] A standing net placed within water-mark to prevent the fishes from returning with the tide. [Scotch.] halves (hävz), n. Plural of half.

halving-belt (hä'ving-belt), n. A belt crossed between two pulleys to make them revolve in opposite directions.

halwet, n. and v. A Middle English form of hallo.

haly (hä'li), a. An obsolete (Middle English) or dialectal (Scotch) form of holy.

halyard, haliard (hä'yärd), n. [Also written haliard, haliyard; commonly regarded as < hale + yard, "because they hale or draw the yards into their places" (Skeat), but more probably a perversion, accommodated to this notion (or to lanyard, laniard, q. v.), of an earlier halier or halier*, equiv. to haler or hawler, < hale + -ier.¹ Halier does occur in other senses: see halier.²] Naut., a rope or purchase used to hoist or lower yards or sails on their respective masts or stays. All yards have halyards except the lower yards and lower topsail-yards.

Each mast has only two shrouds of twisted rattan, which are often both shifted to the weather-side; and the halyard, when the yard is up, serves instead of a third shroud. Anson, Voyages, ii. 10.

Crowfoot-halyards, lines running through a block on a stay, used for tightening the backbone of an awning.—Peak-halyards, the ropes or tackles by which the outer end of a gaff is hoisted.—Signal-halyards, light lines running through sheaves at the gaff-ends or mastsheads, used for hoisting flags.

My attention was now directed by one of the men to the "Waldershare," who was trying to signal us by means of a lantern made fast to the peak signal halyards and run up and down. W. C. Russell, Sailor's Sweetheart, iii.

Throat-halyard, the rope or purchase by which the end of a gaff nearest the mast is hoisted.

halyard-rack (hä'yärd-räk), n. Naut., a wooden framework in which the running part of any halyard is kept coiled, so that it may always be clear for running.

Halymeda, Halymedida. See Halimeda, Halimmeda.

Halymentia (hä'li-mé-ni-ä), n. [NL. (Agardh, 1842), appar. irreg. < Gr. äls, the sea, + μήν, month, or moon.] A genus of marine algae belonging to the natural order Cryptonemae, tribe Gastrocarpeae, characterized by the cylindrical or compressed, gelatinous, membranaceous fronds, which are dichotomous, pinnate, or variously branched, and by the simple cortical layer formed of small oblong cells, its medullary portion being formed of large cells and internal articulated branching filaments. The species are natives of the warmer seas.

Halymentia (hä'li-mé-ni-ä), n. pl. [NL. < Halymentia + -ae.] One of the families of algae established by Kützinger in 1843, coming under his order Periblastaeae of the class Heterocarpeae.

Halymentites (hä'li-mé-ni-téz), n. [NL. < Halymentia + -ites.] A genus of fossil algae, so named by Sternberg in 1838 from its supposed affinity with Halymentia. As emended by Schimper in 1869, it embraces forms with coriaceous or membranaceous, flattened or terete and fistulose fronds, and tubercled or punctiform sporangia immersed in the lamina of the frond. These forms are found in the Cretaceous and Tertiary formations of Europe and America, being specially abundant in the passage-beds between these two systems of rocks. H. major is a large branching species with cylindrical, hollow warty fronds, very abundant in the Upper Cretaceous of the Rocky Mountain region, and called by the settlers petrified corn-cobs.

halymotet, n. Same as hallmote.

Halyseræ (hä'li-sé-ré-ä), n. pl. [NL. < Halyseris + -æ.] In Lindley's system of classification of plants, a suborder of the Fucaceae, having the fronds polysiphonous, barked, jointed, or continuous, and the vesicles scattered over the surface of the frond or collected into heaps.

It embraces the Sphacelariaceae, Laminariaceae, and Sporochneaceae.

Halyserideæ (hä'li-sé-ri-dé-ä), n. pl. [NL. < Halyseris (-rid-) + -æ.] Endlicher's name (1843) for the Halyseræ.

Halyseris (hä'li-sé-ris), n. [NL., appar. irreg. < Gr. äls, the sea, + σῆψις, endive, chicory.] A genus of marine algae, named by Targioni, but first described by Agardh in 1817, belonging to the natural order Dictyotales, and type of the suborder Halyseræ. The frond is flat, dichotomous, and membranaceous, with a median nerve. The spores are naked, and united in sori longitudinally arranged along each side of the costa. About a dozen species are known, inhabiting the warmer seas. A fossil form has been found in the Oolite of Yorkshire, which has been referred to this genus (H. erecta).

Halyserites (hä'li-sé-rí-téz), n. [NL. < Halyseris + -ites.] A genus of fossil algae named by Sternberg in 1838 and emended by Schimper in 1869, having the slender fronds many times dichotomously divided, the branches being provided with a thick costa acuminate at the apex. They occur chiefly in the Devonian and in the Upper Cretaceous of Europe, but also sparingly in the intermediate strata.

Halyssidota (hä'li-si-dó-tä), n. [NL. < Gr. ἁλυσίδωτος, wrought in chain fashion, < ἅλσις, a chain.] A genus of American aretidi moths. H. caryæ is the common hickory tussock-moth of North America. Originally Halesidota. Hübner, 1816.

Halyssites (hä'li-sí-téz), n. [NL. (Fischer) < Gr. ἅλσις, a chain.] The typical genus of chain-corals of the family Halyssitidae: same as Ctenipora.

Halyssitidae (hä'li-sí-tí-dé), n. pl. [NL. < Halyssites + -idae.] A family of paleozoic tabulate corals, taking name from the genus Halyssites; the chain-corals.

Halyssitinae (hä'li-sí-tí-né), n. pl. [NL. < Halyssites + -inae.] A subfamily of chain-corals, referred to Favositidae. Edwards and Haime, 1849.

Halytherium, n. See Halitherium.

ham (ham), n. [ME. hamme, homme, < AS. hamm = D. ham = MLG. ham, hamme = OHG. hamma, MHG. hamme, G. dial. hamme, the ham, = leel. hóm, the ham or haunch of a horse, = Sw. dial. ham, the hind part of the knee; prob. lit. the 'crook' or 'bend' of the leg (cf. OF. F. jambe = Sp. Pg. It. gamba, ML. gamba, leg (see gamb, jamb), ult. of Celtic origin; cf. W. Ir. Gael. cam, crooked, L. camur, crooked; L. camera, camara, < Gr. καμάρη, a vault, chamber, etc.: see cam, camera, camber, chamber, etc.] 1. The back of the thigh; the thigh as a whole; in the plural, the gluteal region; the buttocks.

They [old men] have a plentiful lack of wit, with some with most weak hams. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

I hark ye, pupil;
Go as I taught you, hang more upon your hams,
And put your knees out bent.

Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, ii. 4.
At the caia's those who attended the consul kneeled on the sofa, resting behind on their hams, which is a very humble posture.

Poocke, Description of the East, II. i. 102.

2. In anat., specifically, the back of the knee; the lozenge-shaped area behind the knee, bounded by the hamstrings and heads of the calf-muscles, technically called the popliteal space.—3. The thigh of an animal slaughtered for food; particularly, the thigh of a hog salted and cured or dried in smoke.

Thy truffles, Perigord! thy hams, Bayonne!
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 558.

ham (ham), n. 1st. An obsolete (Middle English and Anglo-Saxon) form of home.—2. In historical use, with reference to the Anglo-Saxon period, a village or town; more specifically, a manor or private estate with a community of serfs upon it: much used in compound local names, as in Birmingham, Nottingham.

Their homes, indeed, must have been scantily sprinkled over the wild and half-reclaimed country; but scant as they were, these "hams" and "tons" told as plainly as in other districts the tale of English colonization.

J. R. Green, Making of Eng., p. 70.

ham (ham), n. [ME. ham, hamme (in comp. names), < AS. ham (hamm), an inclosure, fold, dwelling, chiefly in comp., in local names, in which it became confused with ham, similarly used (see ham, 2). Cf. hem, hemble.] A stunted common pasture for cows. Grose. [Prov. Eng.] hama (hä'mä), n. Same as ama.

Hamacantha (ham-a-kän-thä), n. [NL. < Gr. ἡμα, together, + κανθα, thorn.] The typical genus of Hamacanthinae. J. E. Gray.

Hamacanthinae (ham-a-kän-thí-né), n. pl. [NL. < Hamacantha + -inae.] A subfamily of Heterorrhaphidae, typified by the genus Hamacantha, having megascleres as oxae or styli, and microscleres as diancistræ.

hamadryad (ham-a-dri-ad), n.; pl. hamadryads, hamadryades (-ädz, ham-a-dri-a-déz). [L. hamadryas, pl. hamadryades, < Gr. ἡμαδρύας, pl. ἡμαδρύαδες (also ἡμαδρύες, pl. ἡμαδρύες), < ἡμα, together with (= E. same, q. v.) (or ἡμα-copulative), + δρύς, a tree, esp. the oak-tree, = E. tree: see dryad.] 1. In Gr. myth., a wood-nymph believed to live and die with the tree to which she was attached.

They were called Dryades and Hamadryades, because they begin to live with oaks, and perish together.

Sandys, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii., notes.

The common opinion concerning the nymphs whom the ancients called hamadryades is more to the honour of trees than anything yet mentioned. It was thought that the fate of these nymphs had so near a dependence on some trees, more especially oaks, that they lived and died together. Spectator, No. 589.

I am not sure that the tree was a gainer when the hamadryad flitted and left it nothing but ship-timber.

Lovell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 166.

2. In entom.: (a) A dryad or wood-nymph, a butterfly of the old genus Hamadryas. (b) pl. A group of lepidopterous insects.—3. In herpet., a large, hooded, venomous Indian serpent, Naja hamadryas or Hamadryas elaps, now Ophiophagus elaps. It is related to the cobra.—4. In mammal., a large Abyssinian baboon, Cynocephalus hamadryas, with long mane and whiskers and tufted tail. Also called hebe.

Hamadryas (ha-mad'ri-as), n. [NL. see hamadryad.] 1. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.—2. A genus of venomous serpents, of the family Elapidae. See Ophiophagus. J. E. Gray, 1840.—3. A genus of mollusks.—4. [l. c.] The specific name of a baboon, Cynocephalus hamadryas.

hamal (ham'al), n. [Turk. hammäl, < Ar. hamäl, a porter, carrier, < hamala, carry, bear.] A porter in Constantinople. Two hamals carry immense weights between them, suspended from poles supported on their shoulders.

Hamamelaceæ (ham-a-mé-lä'sé-ä), n. pl. [NL. < Hamamelis + -aceæ.] See Hamamelidæ.

Hamamelæ (ham-a-mé-lä'sé-ä), n. pl. [NL. < Hamamelis + -æ.] In the classification of De Candolle, Gray, and others, a tribe or suborder of plants, of the natural order Hamamelidæ, embracing the genera Hamamelis, Fothergilla, etc., and distinguished from the Balsamifera, to which Liquidambar belongs, by their one-ovuled cells and more apparent floral envelopes.

Hamamelidaceæ (ham-a-mé-li-dä'sé-ä), n. pl. [NL. < Hamamelis (-lid-) + -aceæ.] Same as Hamamelidæ. Lindley, 1846.

Hamamelidæ (ham-a-mé-li-dé-ä), n. pl. [NL. < Hamamelis (-lid-) + -æ.] A natural order of dicotyledonous polypetalous or sometimes apetalous trees or shrubs, chiefly characterized by the inferior or half-inferior ovary and the solitary ovule pendent from the apex of the cell, embracing about 30 species belonging to half as many small genera, of which Hamamelis (the wych-hazel) and Liquidambar (the sweet-gum) are the most important. Proposed by Robert Brown in 1818. Also Hamamelaceæ and Hamamelidaceæ.

Hamamelis (ham-a-mé'lis), n. [NL. < Gr. ἡμαμήλις, a tree with fruit like the pear, a kind of medlar or service-tree, < ἡμα, together with, + μήλιον, apple or other tree-fruit.] The typical genus of the natural order Hamamelidæ, founded by Linnæus in 1753, embracing 2 species of shrubs or small trees, and distinguished from related genera by the 4-parted flowers, deeply lobed calyx, blunt anthers, and deciduous leaves. One of the species is the wych-hazel of North America; the other is a native of Japan. The flowers are polygamous, the staminate (male) ones having elongated, linear petals, which expand in autumn after the leaves have fallen. The leaves are large, crenate, and unequal at the base. The fruit is a dry, woody capsule. See wych-hazel.

hamartiology (ha-mär-ti-al'ö-ji), n. [Gr. ἡμαρτία, error, sin, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. That part of theology which treats of the origin, nature, operations, and effects of sin; the doctrine of sin: a subdivision of anthropology.—2. A treatise or dissertation on sin.

hamartite (ham'är-tit), n. See fluocerite.

hamate (hām'āt), a. [L. hamatus, furnished with a hook, hooked, < hamus, a hook.] 1. Hooked; entangled. [Rare.]

To explain cohesion by hamate atoms is accounted ignominium per ignotius. Berkeley, Siris, § 227.

2. In zool., hooked; uncinate: same as hamulate. [Rare.]—3. In bot., curved like a hook; hooked at the tip: said of hairs, spines, etc.

hamated (hām'ā-ted), a. Hooked, or set with hooks. [Rare.]

Nothing less than a violent heat can disentangle these creatures from their hamated station of life.

Swift, Mechanical Operations of the Spirit.

ham-beetle (hām'bē'tl), n. A beetle, Corynetes (or Necrobis) rufipes, the larva of which often does great damage to cured hams in the United States. More fully called red-legged ham-beetle.

Red-legged Ham-beetle (Corynetes rufipes).

a, larva (line shows natural size); b, pupa (line shows natural size); c, cocoon; d, beetle, enlarged; e, beetle, natural size; f, leg of larva; g, mandible; h, labium; i, maxilla; j, antenna of larva. (f, g, h, i, j, enlarged.)

Two other beetles, the bacon-beetle, Silpha americana, and the larder beetle, Dermestes lardarius, also occasionally injure hams, and the name may be also applied to them. But both the latter chiefly affect tainted or spoiled hams, while the true ham-beetle attacks well-cured hams. See also cut under bacon-beetle.

hamble (hām'bl), v.; pret. and pp. hambled, ppr. hambling. [Also dial. hammel, hamel; < ME. hamelen, mutilate, < AS. hamelian (only once), mutilate (= OFries. homelia (also in verbal n. homelenga, hamelunga, hemelunga, hemelinge, mutilation, as of the beard) = OHG. hamalon, MHG. hameln, mutilate, maim, G. hameln, hameln, geld (lambs), = Icel. hamla = ODan. hamle, mutilate, maim), < hamol* (found in only one passage, in def. form as noun, homota, hometa, used to designate a person with his head shaved (as a mark of disgrace); cf. OSce. homyll, hommel, mod. hummel, hummle, having no horns (of a cow), hamlock, a polled cow, also a person whose head has been shaved or hair cut; see further under humble, v. t., which is ult. a doublet of hamble) = D. hamel, wether, = MLG. hamel, castrated wether, = OHG. hamal, mutilated, cut off (> OHG. hamal, n., a (castrated) wether, MHG. hamel, a wether, also a precipitous height, a cliff, also a stick (cut off), G. hammel, a wether, mutton, > Sw. hammel = ODan. hammel, a wether). Cf. OHG. ham (hamm-), mutilated, crippled, lame, paralytic, MHG. hamen, G. hammen, maim, curtail, and also OFries. hemma, hamma, hinder, obstruct (a limb), MHG. hamen, hemmen, G. hemmen, Dan. hemme, Sw. hämma, stop, hinder, check: senses near that of the ult. allied E. hamper: see hamper, hem, v. I. trans. 1†. To mutilate; hamstring; cut away.

Algate a foot is hamed of thy sorwe.

Chaucer, Troilus, II. 964.

To hammel, or ham-string, to cut the ham, to hough.

E. Phillips, 1706.

2. To cut out the balls of the feet of (dogs), so as to render them unfit for hunting.

II. intrans. To walk lame; limp: in this sense usually hammel, hammle. [Prov. Eng.]

Hambletonian (hām-blō'tō-ni-an), n. [From Black Hambleton, a race-course in Yorkshire, England.] The name of a breed of American trotting-horses descended from Hambletonian (foaled in 1849), and more remotely from Messenger, an English thoroughbred.

hambroline (hām-brō-lin), n. Naut., a sort of small line used for seizings.

Hamburg (hām'bērg), n. 1. An excellent black variety of the Vitis vinifera or European grape, indigenous in Tyrol, where it is called Trolinger or Tyrolinger, and perhaps the favorite grape throughout the world for hothouse cultivation. The berries are oblong, and of a peculiarly delicate and refreshing flavor. Commonly called black Hamburg. The muscat Hamburg is a variety differing but little from the other.

2. A variety of the domestic hen, of small size, with rose comb and blue legs, and the plumage of the male in general similar to that of the female. There are black Hamburgs, and gold- and silver- (yellow- and white-) spangled and pencilled Hamburgs, the spangling or pencilling being black on a yellow or white ground. They are among the prettiest of fowls, and are exceedingly prolific layers, though the eggs are small.

The Hamburgs, erroneously so called from a name given them in the classification adopted at the early Birmingham shows, are chiefly breeds of English origin.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 645.

hame¹ (hām), n. [< ME. hame, home, < AS. hama, hōma, a cover, skin, = OS. hamo = OFries. homa, hama, a cover, = D. haam, a hame (def. 2), = MLG. ham = OHG. ham, MHG. ham, ham, G. hamen = Icel. hamr = Dan. ham = Goth. hama*, a cover, covering (> ga-hamōn, cover). In sense 2 the word is perhaps of D. origin.] 1†. A covering; a skin; a membrane.

Of he caste his dragouns hame.

King Alisaunder (ed. Skeat), I. 391.

Hame, thyn skynne of an eye or other lyke, membrana.

Prompt. Parv., p. 416.

2. One of two curved pieces of wood or metal in the harness of a draft-horse, to which the traces are fastened, and which lie upon the collar or have pads attached to them fitting the horse's neck. See cut under harness.—Hamestraps or hame-strings, the straps or strings which bind together the ends of the hames. See cut under harness.

hame² (hām), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of *halm*¹.

hame³ (hām), n. A Scotch form of *home*¹.

hamelet, n. See *hamlet*¹.

Hamelia (hā-mē'li-ā), n. [NL., named after the French botanist Du Hamel (Duhamel-Dumonceau, 1700–82).] A genus of tropical or subtropical American shrubs, founded by Jacquin in 1763, belonging to the natural order Rubiaceae, and type of the tribe Hamelieae, having a 5-lobed calyx, 5-ribbed corolla with stamens inserted at the base of its tube, a fusiform stigma, and the flowers arranged in scorpioid cymes. The genus embraces 6 or 8 species, several of which, especially H. patens, have handsome flowers, and are in cultivation as stove-plants. H. ventricosa, a native of Jamaica, is there called Spanish elm.

Hameliaceae (hā-mē-li-ā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. Richard, 1834), < Hamelia + -aceae.] A group of genera of rubiaceous plants, of which Hamelia is the type, equal to the tribe Hamelieae of De Candolle.

Hamelidae (hām-el-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamelia + -idae.] In Lindley's system, a suborder of Cinchonaceae, having the genus Hamelia as the type, and substantially the same as the tribe Hamelieae of De Candolle.

Hamelieae (hām-ē-lī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamelia + -eae.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Rubiaceae, established by Bentham and Hooker in 1783, having the corolla-lobes imbricate or twisted in the bud, the ovary 2-to many-celled, with many ovules in each cell, and a fleshy or coriaceous, many-seeded, berry-like fruit. It embraces 6 genera, all but one of which are natives of tropical America; one, Bertiera, is also found in tropical Africa, and one, Gouardia, is confined to the Hawaiian islands.

hamer, n. An obsolete form of *hammer*¹.

hamesucken (hām'suk-n), n. [Sc., < AS. hamsōcn, an attack on a man's house, also the fine thereof (= Icel. hemsōkn; cf. OFries. hām, hēmkegn, hēmkegn, an attack on one's house, MLG. heimsōke, an attack on one's house, hemsōkinge, visit, attack, Dan. hemsøgelse, Sw. hemsökande, hemsökelse, hemsökning, visitation, infliction, MHG. heimsuoch, heimsuoch, G. heimsuchung, visitation, punishment, MLG. heimsoken, visit, attack a house, MHG. heimsuchen, heimsuchen, G. heimsuchen, visit, punish, Dan. hemsøge = Sw. hemsöka, visit upon, infest, < hām, home, + sōcn, a seeking: see home and soken.] In Scots law, the offense of feloniously beating or assaulting a person in his own house or dwelling-place. Also homesocken.

hamfatter (hām'fat'ēr), n. A term of contempt for an actor of a low grade, as a negro minstrel. Said to be derived from an old-style negro song called "The Ham-fat Man."

ham, n. Plural of hamus.

hamiform (hām'i-fōrm), a. [< L. hamus, a hook, + forma, shape.] Hamate or hamulate in form; unciform; uncinat.

Hamiglossa (hām-i-glos'ā), n. pl. [NL., < L. hamus, a hook, + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue.] A group of proboscis-bearing gastropods with the radular teeth in three longitudinal rows, of which the central row is fixed, while the lateral rows are changeable. It includes such families as the Muricidae and Buccinidae, or the whelks and the like.

hamiglossate (hām-i-glos'āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hamiglossa.

Hamilton group. See *group*¹.

Hamiltonia (hām-il-tō'ni-ā), n. [NL., named after F. Buchanan (1762–1829), who took in his later years the name of Hamilton, author of various works, some relating to India.] A genus of shrubs, founded by Roxburgh in 1814, belonging to the natural order Rubiaceae, tribe Pederieae, distinguished by the 5-celled ovary, 5-parted style, and reticulate seed-coat, and embracing 3 or 4 species, natives of India, China, and the Indian archipelago. They have showy flowers with long tubular corollas, arranged in terminal panicles. Two of the species, H. suaveolens and H. scabra, have fragrant white flowers, and are well known to florists.

Hamiltonian (hām-il-tō'ni-an), a. and n. I. a. 1. Pertaining to James Hamilton (1769–1831), and especially to a system of teaching languages which he advocated, and which was based upon the two principles that language is to be presented to the scholar as a living organism, and that its laws are to be learned by observation and not by rules.—2. Pertaining to Sir William Hamilton (1788–1856), an influential philosopher and logician of the Scottish school.

The general principle of the Hamiltonian logic.

R. Adamson, Encyc. Brit., XIV. 799.

3. Pertaining to Sir William Rowan Hamilton (1805–65), an Irish mathematician.—4. Pertaining to or holding the political doctrines of Alexander Hamilton (1757–1804), an American statesman, who was one of the leaders of the Federalist party and the first Secretary of the Treasury.

Laying entirely aside the general proposition that the Hamiltonian Federalists considered a national debt as in itself a desirable institution, and conceding that the Federalists would themselves have ultimately reduced or discharged it, there still remains the fact that the Federalists made the debt a subordinate, Mr. Gallatin made it a paramount, consideration in politics.

H. Adams, Gallatin, p. 174.

Hamiltonian equation. See equation.—Hamiltonian functions. See function.—Hamiltonian operator. See operator.

II. n. A follower of any one of the persons named above. See I.

Hamiltonism (hām'il-ton-izm), n. [< Hamilton (see def.) + -ism.] The philosophy of Sir William Hamilton.

This is Kantian, but it is not Hamiltonism.

J. S. Mill, Examination of Hamilton, III.

hamirostrate (hām-i-ros'trāt), a. [< L. hamus, a hook, + rostrum, a beak.] Having a hooked beak; uncirostrate.

Hamite¹ (hām'it), n. [< Ham (see def.) + -ite.]

1. A descendant of Ham, one of the sons of Noah according to the account in Genesis; a member of one of the races supposed to have been derived from the four sons of Ham (Gen. x.); specifically, one of a race speaking a so-called Hamitic language. See Hamitic.—2. Popularly, an African; a negro.

Whilst the Caucasian doubts the humanity of the Hamite, the latter repays the compliment in kind.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 207.

hamite² (hām'it), n. [< L. hamus, a hook, + -ite.] A fossil cephalopod of the genus Hamites.

Hamites (hā-mī'tēz), n. [NL. (Parkinson, 1811), < L. hamus, a hook, + -ites.] A genus of fossil cephalopods, related to Ammonites, having the shell hooked or bent upon itself in separate courses, not in spiral whorls. There are numerous species, chiefly from the Chalk.

Hamitic (hā-mit'ik), a. [*< Hamite*¹ + -ic.] Of or pertaining to Ham, one of the sons of Noah (Gen. x.), or to any of the races considered to be his descendants. The Hamitic tongues are a class of African languages, comprising the ancient Egyptian of the hieroglyphs and the later Egyptian or Coptic, and the non-Semitic languages of Abyssinia and the regions further south, including the Galla and the Libyan or Berber, to which some authorities add the Hottentot. They are believed by many to have more or less distant affinities with the Semitic family.

Hamitidae (hā-mit-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamites + -idae.] A family of fossil cephalopods, typified by the genus Hamites, generally referred to the family Ammonitidae.

hamkin¹ (hām'kin), n. [Appar. < *ham*¹ + dim. -kin.] A pudding made upon the bone of a shoulder of mutton, all the flesh being first taken off. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.] hamlet¹ (hām'let), n. [< ME. hamlet, hamelet, a hamlet, < OF. AF. hamlet, hamelet, m. (also hamlette, f.), dim., with -et, of OF. hamel, f. hameau (ML. hamellum), a village, dim., with -el, of ham*, < OFries. hām, North Fries. hamm, a home, dwelling, AS. hām, E. home, village: see *home*¹ and *ham*².] A small village; a little cluster of houses in the country; especially, in England, a village without a church, which therefore for its ecclesiastical service belongs to the parish represented by another village. Compare parish. The word has no technical use in the United States, except as the legal designation of a few villages in Michigan and Ohio.

Sometimes with secure delight
The upland hamlets will invite.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 92.

Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.

Gray, Elegy.

To several of these towns there are small appendages belonging called hamlets, which are taken notice of in the statute of Exeter. Blackstone, Com., Int., § 4.

=Syn. See town.

hamlet² (ham'let), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A fish of the family Serranidae, Epinephus striatus, also called Nassau grouper, common in the West Indies and along the Florida coast. It is chestnut-brown or slate-colored, with vermilion lips and throat.

hamleted (ham'let-ed), a. [*< hamlet*¹ + -ed.] Established in or accustomed to a hamlet or a country life. [Rare.]

He is properly and pithily to be counted alone that is illiterate, and unactively lives hamleted in some untravelled village of the duller country.

Pelham, Resolves, ii. 49.

hammam, hummum (ham'am, hum'um), n. [< Ar. hammām, a hot bath, < hammim, heat water for a bath.] An establishment for bathing in the Oriental manner with sweating and manipulation; as a Turkish or other Oriental bath.

I . . . got a late hackney chariot and drove to the Hummings in Covent Garden.

Dickens, Great Expectations, xlv.

Sometimes . . . we induce him to accompany us to the Hammam, where he [Shaykh Mohammed] insists upon paying the smallest sum, quarrelling with everything and everybody.

R. F. Burton, El-Mednash, p. 70.

hammel, hammle (ham'l), v. i. Dialectal forms of hamble.

hammer¹ (ham'ér), n. [< ME. hamer, homer, < AS. hamor, hamer, homer = OS. hamur = OFries. hamer, hamer = D. hamer = MLG. hamer = OHG. hamar, MHG. hamer, G. hammer = Icel. hamarr = Sw. hammare = Dan. hammer, a hammer. The Icel. hamarr means also a crag, rock, suggesting a connection with O.Bulg. kameni, Russ. kamene, a stone, these and the Teut. forms having (in this view) suffered a transposition of the first two consonants:

cf. Lith. akmu (akmen-) = Lett. akmins, a stone, = Gr. akmon, an anvil, thunderbolt, = Skt. acman, a stone, thunderbolt. The first hammers were of stone.] 1. An instrument consisting of a solid head, usually of metal, but sometimes of wood or of stone, set crosswise to the handle, used for beating metals, driving nails or spikes, dressing or breaking stones, etc.; hence, a machine in which a heavy block of metal is used for such a purpose. See steam-hammer, tilt-hammer, trip-hammer. The head of the hammer is made in various forms, according to the use to which it is to be put. Hammers of stone are found among the remains of antiquity, and are still in use among barbarous races. The hammer has also been used as a weapon of attack in war. See martel-de-fer.

The hamyr bothe stern and grete,
That droffe the nayls throw hand and fote,
Lord, be myn socowr in alle myn lyffe.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 185.

Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces? Jer. xlii. 29.

Gold itself will be sometimes so eager (as artists call it) that it will as little endure the hammer as glass itself.

Locke, Human Understanding, iii. 6.

2. Something which resembles the common hammer in form, action, or use. (a) The piece in a clock which strikes upon the bell to indicate the hour; the striker. (b) In a bell, an independent wooden or metallic lever by which it is sounded: distinguished from a tongue, which is attached to the bell, and is usually operated by swinging the bell itself, though a tongue is sometimes used as a hammer. (c) A small wooden mallet with a padded end or knob, held in the hand, with which the strings of the dulcimer and other similar instruments are struck. (d) In the pianoforte, that part of the mechanism or "action" that is thrown against the strings by the key or digital. It consists of a slender, elastic wooden shank, and a wooden head thickly covered with felt. Each key has its own hammer, which strikes against the one, two, three, or four strings belonging to that particular key. (e) That part of the lock of a firearm which falls with a sharp blow and causes the discharge of the piece. In the flint-lock the piece of flint was secured in the front of the hammer and struck sharply against the steel covering the pan, displacing it and throwing sparks into the priming in the pan. In the percussion-lock the blow of the hammer explodes the percussion-cap. Ordinarily the hammer can be fixed at half-lock, at which point the pull of the trigger does not move it, and at full-lock, when the movement of the trigger will release it. The form of the hammer and the mode of its action in exploding the charge differ greatly in different kinds of guns. See rebouncing lock (under lock), and out under gun. (f) A gavel used by auctioneers. See to bring to the hammer, below.

Off as the price-deciding hammer falls,

He notes it in his book. Cowper, Task, vi. 291.

(g) A door-knocker. [Rare.]

Then nightly Knockings at your Door will cease, Whose noiseless Hammer, then, may rust in Peace.

Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

(h) In anat., the malleus. (i) The head of a sphyrnid or hammer-headed shark.

The eyes on the sides of the "hammer"; mouth crescent-shaped, under the "hammer".

Hakewill, Apology.

Atmospheric hammer. See atmospheric. — Cat's-head hammer. Same as bully-head. — Ceremonial hammer, in archaeol., a small stone object resembling the head of a hammer or hatchet, one or two edged, and drilled with a fine hole, apparently intended to be hung about the person as an amulet. It is especially common in North America, but amber beads resembling it in form are found in northern Europe. Compare ceremonial hatchet, under hatchet.

— Dead-stroke hammer. See drop-press. — Dental hammer or plugger, an apparatus used in filling teeth with gold, consisting of a plugging instrument fitted to a loose sleeve carrying a spring and a tapping device. When the instrument is pressed against the filling of the teeth, the sleeve or tool-stock moves back till a detent is passed, when the sleeve is released and under the influence of the spring strikes a blow upon the plugger. Also called automatic mallet. — Double hammer, a forging device for operating upon a bloom or puddles' ball, striking it on opposite sides simultaneously. Farrow. — Electric hammer, an electrical apparatus for working a rock-drill. It is constructed on the principle of the dental hammer. — Enlarging-hammer, the hammer used by a gold-beater. It weighs 14 or 15 pounds, and is shaped like a truncated hexagonal pyramid, with a slightly convex face. — Fairy hammer. See fairy. — Hammer and tongs, with great noise, vigor, or violence; violently; vigorously. [Colloq.]

Mr. Malone . . . dashed out of a doorway close by, and before they had time to form line of battle, fell upon them hammer and tongs.

H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, ix.

Horseman's hammer. Same as martel-de-fer. — Lucerne hammer, a name given to the war-hammer or marreau of armies when fitted with a long handle for the use of foot-soldiers; so called because a favorite weapon with Swiss mercenaries from Lucerne. — Millstone hammer. Same as mill-pick. — Nasmyth hammer, a steam-hammer used in forging large masses of metal, especially iron, and having its head attached to the piston-rod of the steam-engine by which it is worked. — Patent hammer, in stone-dressing, a hammer having knife-like ridges on its face, numbering 6, 8, or 10 to the inch. — Thor's hammer. (a) In Norse myth, the hammer of the god Thor, by the welding or throwing of which thunder and lightning were supposed to be caused. (b) Same as fyfot. (c) A pendent ornament, usually of silver, found among relics of the prehistoric iron age in the north of Europe. It has somewhat the shape of a mallet, and is undoubtedly intended to represent a hammer as weapon or utensil. — To bring or come to the hammer, to sell or be sold at auction: from the use by auctioneers of a gavel or small hammer to indicate by a rap the sale of an article to the highest bidder, called knocking it down.

Old Sir Robert's pride,

His books — the more the pity, so I said —

Came to the hammer here in March.

Tennyson, Audley Court.

Veneering-hammer, a flat square of hard wood or iron with a handle projecting at right angles. (See also tuning-hammer, water-hammer.)

hammer-beam (ham'ér-bēm), n. A short beam attached to the foot of a principal rafter in a roof, in place of a tie-beam. Hammer-beams are used in pairs, and project from the wall, extending less than half-way across the apartment. The hammer-beam is generally supported by a rib resting upon a corbel below, and in its turn forms the support of another rib which constitutes, with that springing from the opposite hammer-beam, an arch. Although occupying the place of a tie in the roofing, it does not act as a tie; it is essentially a lever, as is shown in the figure. Here the inner end of the hammer-beam, A, receives the weight of the upper part of the roof, which is balanced by the pressure of the principal at its outer end.

Hammer-beam Roof, Westminster Hall, London.
A, A, Hammer-beams.

hammer-blow (ham'ér-blô), n. The blow of a hammer, or a blow resembling that of a hammer, as the impact of an unbalanced wheel.

The so-called hammer-blow in locomotives is the irregularity of the pressure exerted between the wheel and rail, which arises from the vertically-unbalanced action of the counter-weights placed in the wheel to neutralize the horizontal action of the piston and other moving parts.

Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXIII. 42.

hammer-cap (ham'ér-kap), n. A cover for the cock of a gun.

hammer-catcher (ham'ér-kach'ér), n. In pi-anoforte-making, the padded shoulder which catches the hammer on its return after striking the string.

hammer-cloth (ham'ér-klôth), n. [The earliest form, hamer-cloth, is quoted from the time of Queen Mary; said to be "so called from the old practice of carrying a hammer, nails, etc., in a pocket hid by this cloth" (Webster). Others link the orig. form was hamper-cloth*. Cloth takes hammer to be a corruption or an adaptation of the D. word hemel, canopy, a tester, covering, quoting "den hemel van een koetsse, the seeling [ceiling] of a coach" (Hexam), "the testern of a coach" (Sewel): see under heaven.] The cloth which covers the driver's seat in some kinds of carriage, usually falling in plaits on all four sides. See cut under coach.

hammer-pick (ham'ér-pik), n. A tool having a hammer-face at one end of the head and a pointed pick at the other; a pick-hammer.

hammer-pike (ham'ér-pik), n. A long-shafted weapon resembling the war-hammer. It was carried in the French army by the subalterns in charge of the flag under the first empire (1804-14). Farrow, Mil. Encyc.

hammer-scale (ham'ér-skäl), n. Same as forge-scale.

hammer-sedge (ham'ér-sej), n. A common European sedge, Carex hirta.

hammer-shell (ham'ér-shel), n. A bivalve mollusk of the pearl-oyster family, Aviculida, and genus Malleus: so called from the shape of the shell. There are several species, of Oriental seas, the best-known being Malleus vulgaris. Also called hammer-oyster.

Hammer-shell (Malleus vulgaris).

hammer-stone (ham'ér-stôn), n. See flaking-hammer.

hammer-tail (ham'ér-täl), n. In clockwork, a projection extending from the arbor of the rod or lever that supports the hammer, on which the pins or teeth of a wheel in the striking mechanism act, as it revolves, to raise the hammer.

There are three cross bars, . . . which are utilized also for carrying cocks for "leading off," for hammer-tails, winding pinions, etc.

Sir E. Beckett, Clocks and Watches, p. 185.

hammer-tongs (ham'ér-tôngz), n. pl. Tongs having jaws terminating in pins, used in handling objects in which holes have been punched, such as the heads of hammers and hatchets.

hammerwise (ham'ér-wiz), adv. [*hammer*¹ + -wise.] As if with a hammer.

One of them saucily snatched off her shoe, and cracked them [almonds] hammerwise with the heel.

Hovells, Their Wedding Journey, p. 282.

hammerwort (ham'ér-wért), n. [Cf. AS. ham-orwyr, black hellebore, < hamor, hammer, + wyr, wort.] The plant pellitory, Parietaria.

hammer-wrought (ham'ér-rät), a. Worked into shape by means of a hammer, as iron: said of armor and the like, and also of decorative wrought-iron work.

hammite (ham'it), n. Same as ammite.

hammle, v. i. A dialectal form of hamble.

hammock¹ (ham'ók), n. [Formerly hamack (Sir T. Herbert) or, as Sp., hamaca = F. hamac, It. amaca, Pg. maca, OD. hammak, later acom. hangmak, hangmat, G. hangmatte, hängmatte (as if 'hanging mat'), < Sp. hamaca, a hammock; of West Indian origin. Columbus, in the narrative of his first voyage, says: "A great many Indians in canoes came to the ship to-day for the purpose of bartering their cotton, and hamacas or nets in which they sleep." 1. A kind of hanging bed. Hammocks used at sea, especially on men-of-war, are made of canvas, and have a number of cords at each end, called clues, which are brought together and secured to an iron ring, which is hung on a hook attached to the deck-beams. Those used in the tropical parts of America and in summer in the north are usually formed of a network of Panama grass or small cords.

I . . . conducted them into one of the houses, where we did presently hang up our hammocks.

Dampier, Voyages, an. 1688.

Mrs. Truncheon was out of humour when she found herself under the necessity of being confined with her spouse in a hammock. Smollett, Peregrine Pickle, ix.

O mother, praying God will save Thy sailor—while thy head is bow'd,
His heavy-shotted hammock shroud
Drops in his vast and wandering grave.

Tennyson, in Memoriam, vi.

2. In entom., the hammock-like sack or case carried by the larvæ of certain tineid moths, as Ecophora harrisiella, hence called case-bearers.

If he [P. Huber] took a caterpillar which had completed its hammock up to, say, the sixth stage of construction, and put it into a hammock completed up only to the third stage, the caterpillar simply reformed the fourth, fifth, and sixth stages of construction.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 206.

To lash a hammock (naut.), to roll a hammock up smoothly and pass a lashing round it.—To sling a hammock (naut.), to fasten in the clues of a hammock and get it ready for use.

hammock-clues (ham'ók-klöz), n. pl. An arrangement of small lines at each end of a hammock by which it is suspended.

hammock-nettings (ham'ók-net'ingz), n. pl. Long troughs or boxes constructed on top of the bulwarks of the spar-deck in a man-of-war, in which the hammocks are stowed during the daytime. In former times the hammocks were stowed, when not in use, in rope nettings, whence the name.

hammock-rack (ham'ók-rak), n. Same as hammock-nettings.

hamose, hamous (hāmōs, -mus), a. -[< L. hamus, a hook.] In bot., same as hamate, 3.

Hampden's case. See case of ship-money, under ship-money.

hamper¹ (ham'pér), v. t. [Cf. ME. hamperen, hamperen (rare), hamper, oppress; origin uncertain; supposed by Skeat to stand for hameren* (the p excrecent), another form of ME. hamelen, mutilate, E. hamble (where b is excrecent); but excrecent p would hardly occur in such a position; the reg. form would be hambren* (cf. ME. hamber, var. of hamer, hammer; E. number, etc.), which could hardly change to hamperen; and the senses are too unlike to be immediately connected. A remoter connection, however, may exist; cf. hamble, which is connected, through OHG. ham (hamm-), mutilated, crippled, lame, paralytic, with MHG. hemmen, G. hemmen, stop, hinder, check. With hamble, cf. North. E. hamel, walk lame, Sc. hamble, walk in an ungainly manner, so as to be constantly in danger of stumbling, Sc. hamp, halt in walking, stutter, read with difficulty, hamp, n., a halt in walking, stuttering; E. dial. hammer, stammer. Cf. also Sc. habble, stutter, speak or act confusedly; OD. haperen, stutter, hesitate, D. haperen, falter, hesitate.] 1. To impede in motion or progress; render motion or progress difficult to; shackle; entangle; restrain by force.

Hampton Court Conference. See conference.

hamshackle (ham'shak-l), v. t.; pret. and pp. hamshackled, ppr. hamshackling. [Usually explained as *ham*¹ + shackle, but it is the fore leg that is shackled, and the fore leg is not and has not a ham. Cf. equiv. hapshackle, hopshackle, hoishackle.] To shackle, as a horse or a cow, by a rope or strap attached to the head and to one of the legs, to prevent it from running away or wandering too far; hence, to curb; restrain.

hamster (ham'stér), n. [= D. Dan. Sw. hamster, < G. hamster, MHG. hamster, hamester (ML. hamester), hamster, < OHG. hamastro, found only in the sense of 'weevil'; = OS. hamstra, weevil; an isolated word, prob. borrowed.] 1. A murine or myomorph rodent quadruped, of the family Muridae and subfamily Cricetinae, and of one of the genera Cricetus, Cricetomys, and Saccostomus. They are furnished with cheek-pouches, which are the principal distinctive character of the group in comparison with other Muridae. The common hamster, Common Hamster (Cricetus frumentarius).

Cricetus frumentarius, inhabits parts of Europe and Asia. It is a stout little animal about 10 inches long, with a short hairy tail. It is variegated in color (black on the under parts), burrows deeply in the ground, stores its galleries with grain, and hibernates during the colder months. It is very prolific, and readily breeds in confinement. The fur is poor, short, and coarse, but is sometimes used for the lining of cloaks. The other genera above named are African.

2. Some other pouched rodent, as of the genus Geomys, more or less resembling a hamster.—Georgia hamster, Rafinesque's name of the gopher of the southern United States, Geomys tuxa.

hamstring (ham'string), n. 1. In human anat., the tendon of a muscle which bounds the ham, or space behind the knee on either side above the middle of the popliteal space. The outer hamstring is single, and is the tendon of the biceps muscle; there are three inner hamstrings, the tendons of the semitendinosus, semimembranosus and gracilis muscles, with which a fourth, that of the sartorius, may be reckoned. These muscles flex the leg upon the thigh, and, with the exception of the sartorius and gracilis, extend the thigh upon the trunk.

2. In ordinary language, the great tendon or sinew at the back of the so-called knee or hock of the hind leg of a quadruped. It is the tendo Achillis, or tendon of the gastrocnemius muscle, corresponding to that at the back of the human ankle, and extends the foot or pes upon the leg or crus. See cut under horse.

hamstring (ham'string), v. t.; pret. and pp. hamstrung or hamstringed, ppr. hamstringing. [< hamstring, n.] 1. To cut the hamstrings of, and thus lame or disable.

With this instrument they ride at a beast, and surround him, when the hunter that comes behind him hamstrings him.

Anson, Voyages, I. 6.

He defended himself desperately, and would have cut his way through them, had they not hamstringed his horse.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., v.

2. In whaling, to cut the muscle or tendons of the small of the whale, so as to render the flukes useless and make the animal helpless. It is done with the fluke-spade when a boat is hauled up alongside a running whale.

hamular (ham'ū-lār), a. [< L. hamul-us + *-ar*³.] Same as hamulate.

hamulate (ham'ū-lāt), a. [< L. hamul-us + *-atē*¹.] 1. In anat. and zool., hooked; uncinate: as, the hamulate process of the sphenoid bone. See cut under craniofacial.—2. In bot., having a little hook at the tip; covered with little hooks. Also hamulose, hamulous.

hamule (ham'ū-l), n. [< L. hamulus, q. v.] Same as hamulus, 1.

hamuli, n. Plural of hamulus, 1.

hamulose, hamulous (ham'ū-lōs, -lus), a. [< hamul-us + -osē, -ous.]. In bot., same as hamulate, 2.

hamulus (ham'ū-lus), n. [L., dim. of hamus, a hook.] 1. Pl. hamuli (-li). A little hook or hooklet. Specifically—(a) In anat., a hook-like process of a bone. The hamulus lacrymalis is the hook-like process at the lower end of the vertical ridge of the lacrymal bone, which helps to bound the upper orifice of the lacrymal canal. The hamulus pterygoideus is the hook-like process of the pterygoid portion of the sphenoid bone, over which runs the tendon of the tensor palati muscle. (See cut under craniofacial.) The hamulus laminae spiralis is the hook-like process in which the osseous spiral lamina ends at the apex of the cochlea. (b) In bot., applied specifically by some authors to the rudimentary axis of the spikelets in the genus Uncinia, which is exerted from the apex of the utricle, and produced into a long awn that is recurved or hooked at the tip, this being the character which chiefly distinguishes that genus from Carex, and especially from Schenopodium, which last has the awn without the hook. See Uncinia. (c) In ornith., the hooklet of a feather; a hooked barbel; the hooked fringe of a barbule. (d) In entom., one of the minute hooks, forming a row on the anterior margin of the lower wing, found in hymenopterous insects. They can be applied to the hinder margin of the anterior wing, thus binding the two together, and forming a continuous surface during flight. Also called spinula. (e) In obot., a hook for extracting the fetus; a crochet. Also called hamule.

2. [cap.] [NL.] In zool., a genus of mollusks. Morton, 1834.

hamus (hā'mus), n.; pl. hami (-mī). [L.] A hook; a hamulus. Specifically, in entom., a small hooked process or loop on the lower side of each anterior wing, near the base, found in many Lepidoptera. A bristle called the tendo, on the lower wing, passes through this loop, and aids in keeping the wings together during flight. The hamus, though not the tendo, is said to be peculiar to male insects, and it is found only in strong-flying species.

hant. An old present indicative plural and infinitive of have, contracted from haven. Chaucer.

Hanafite (han'a-fit), n. [Ar. Hanafiyah, < Abu Hanifah: see def.] A member of the oldest and most important of the four orthodox sects of Sunnite Mohammedans, founded by Abu Hanifah of Kufah (about A. D. 700–770), a puritan in doctrine and the author of a system of jurisprudence. Also Hanifite.

He was a Sunnite, probably according to the Hanafite rite.

Encyc. Brit., XVII. 237.

hanap (han'ap), n. [ME., < OF. hanap, hanep, henap, henapp, henap, henap, etc., = Pr. enap = It. anappo, nappo (ML. hanapus), a drinking-cup, < OHG. knapf, MHG. G. napf = MLG. nap = D. nap = AS. hnæpp, a cup, bowl, basin.] 1. A large drinking-goblet, especially the vessel from which the chief guest at an entertainment or the presiding dignitary was served.

Handled mugs of silver and wood (hanaps), curtains, cloths, and other things necessary for a tavern.

Riley, London Memorials, quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., I. 457.

Hence—2. A vessel of precious material, as silver or silver gilt, fitted with a cover, from which the taster drank a little wine taken from the hanap.—3. In the fifteenth century, a measure, especially for wine, ale, and the like. It is forbidden, on the ground that it is not a fixed measure, by a regulation of Henry IV.

hanaper (han'a-pér), n. [< ME. hampere, < OF. hanapier, hanaper, hanepier, hanepier, hanepier, chanapier, etc. (ML. AL. hanaperium), a case for a hanap or drinking-cup, or for other vessels, also the skull, also a helmet or casque, also in AF. and AL. use a case for documents, etc., < hanap, hanep, etc., a drinking-cup: see hanap. Hence, later, by contraction and assimilation, *hanaper*², q. v.] 1*t.* Same as *hanaper*², 1. Holland.—2*t.* Same as hanap, 1.—3. A receptacle for documents or valuable articles, formerly used in England. It was often made of wickerwork, and sometimes covered with leather.—4. [cap.] An office (in full, the Hanaper Office) of the English Court of Chancery, from which various writs were formerly sent out. So called because all writs regarding the public were once kept in a hanaper (i.e. hanaperio), and those concerning the crown in a little sack or bag. Also called Hamper.—Clerk of the Hanaper. See clerk.

Hanbalite (han'bal-it), n. [< Hanbal (see def.) + *-ite*².] A member of the last of the four orthodox sects of the Sunnite Mohammedans, founded by the imam Ahmad Ibn Hanbal of Bagdad (A. D. 780–855). The Hanbalites were fanatical, and are supposed to be now chiefly represented by the Wahabees of Arabia.

hance¹, v. t. [< ME. hancen, hanssen, raise, increase: see enhance.] To raise; elevate; increase; enhance.

Thou heigest holichurche to hanssen hire strengthe.

Joseph of Arimathe (E. E. T. S.), p. 8.

hance² (hans), n. [Also written hanse, early mod. E. also harnce, hanuse; var. hanch, haunch, q. v.] 1. In arch., same as haunch, 6; by older writers more especially applied (a) to the lower part, above the springing, of three- and four-centered arches; (b) to a small arch by which a straight lintel is sometimes united to its jamb or impost.—2. pl. Naut., falls of the five-rails placed on balusters on the poop and quarter-deck down to the gangway.

hance³, n. See hanse.

hanch (hanch), n. In arch., same as haunch, 6.

hanchet (han'chet), n. In her., a bugle-horn used as a bearing.

hanchinol (han'chi-nol), n. [Mex.] A shrub by Mexican plant, Nesaea salicifolia, belonging to the natural order Lythraceae, having lanceolate, often ternate leaves, and solitary yellow flowers. It is said to be sudorific, diuretic, and antisyphilitic. See Nesaea. Also written hanchinal.

Hancornia (han-kór'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Gomes, 1812).] A genus of Brazilian shrubs, belonging to the natural order Apocynaceae, tribe Carisseeae, having the stamens included below the apex of the corolla-tube, opposite leaves, and few-flowered terminal cymes. It consists of a single species, H. speciosa, with drooping branches, small, oblong, pointed leaves, and milky juice. The fruit is about as large as a plum, and is said to be delicious when thoroughly ripe. It is called by the Brazilians mangava or mangaba. The juice, when exposed to the air, hardens into a kind of caoutchouc.

hand (hand), n. [< ME. hand, hond, < AS. hand, hond = OS. Ofries, D. hand = MLG. hant, LG. hand = OHG. MHG. hant, G. hand = I. G. hönd, hand = Sw. hand = Dan. haand = Goth. handus, hand. Root uncertain; usually associated with Goth. hinthan* (pret. hanth*, ppr. hynthans*), take, only in comp. fra-hinthan and us-hinthan, take captive, AS. hentan, ge-hentan, take, seize, hūntian, hunt; cf. hent, hint, hūnt, and see hend, which is a derivative of hand. Cf. finger, in a (supposed) similar relation to fang, take, seize.] 1. The end of the arm or fore limb from the wrist outward, consisting of the palm, fingers, and thumb, and fitted for grasping objects. The perfect development of the hand is found only in man; but other animals, as monkeys, mice, squirrels, opossums, and other mammals, possess prehensile paws, or hands in a broad sense of the word. In man the fore limb is entirely withdrawn from the offices of support and locomotion, at least in adult life, and is devoted to the function of prehension, for which it is perfectly adapted by the mobility of all the digits, as well as by their respective difference in total length and in the length of their joints, and especially by the great freedom of the thumb, which can be perfectly apposed to the fingers collectively or to any one of them. Another important point in the perfection of a hand is its capability of complete pronation and supination, a movement of rotation following the motion of the radius about the ulna, by which the palm may be brought uppermost, when the hand is supine, or turned downward, when the hand is prone. None of the pronator or supinator muscles actually reach the hand, which simply carries out the movement of the radius. In the human hand there are 27 bones, namely, 8 carpal or wrist-bones proper, 5 metacarpals, and 14 phalanges, 3 to each of the four fingers and 2 to the thumb. The muscles which actuate the hand are numerous; they consist of several carpal extensors and flexors; several "long" common and special extensors and flexors of the digits, those of the thumb being most numerous and highly specialized; and certain "short" muscles confined to the palm, as those of the base of the thumb. (See cut under muscle.) In most mammals which have hands in this sense the structure and composition of parts are similar, the anatomical differences being slight in comparison with the degrees of physiological adaptation to prehension, or functional efficiency.

In his hand he bears a mighty bowe.

Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., l. 108.

The fyngres fourmen a ful hande to purtreye or peynten Keryunge and compaynyng as crafte of the fyngres.

Piers Plowman (B.), xvii. 169.

In colour like the fingers of a hand

Before a burning taper. Tennyson, Holy Grail.

The Gorilla's hand is clumsier, heavier, and has a thumb somewhat shorter in proportion than that of man; but no one has ever doubted its being a true hand.

Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 108.

2. In anat., technically, the terminal segment of the fore limb of any vertebrate above fishes, consisting of three divisions, the carpus, metacarpus, and phalanges; the manus: the correlative of the pes of the hind limb. In this sense the term hand is used irrespective of modifications in structure or function. See manus, and cut under pinion.—3. The end of any limb which grasps, holds, or clings, as the hind foot of a monkey, a bat, an opossum, etc. Specifically—(a) In falconry, the foot of a hawk. (b) In the manège, a horse's fore foot. (c) In entom., the tarsus of the anterior leg: a term used by old writers, and corresponding to the manus of Kirby. (d) In crustaceans, the chelate claw, or chela, technically called manus. See cut under chela.

4. A measure of four inches; a palm: used chiefly in measuring the height of horses: as, a horse 14 hands high.—5. Side; part; direction, to either right or left: used both literally and figuratively: as, on the one hand or the other.

He with a graceful pride,
While his rider every hand survey'd, Sprung loose.

Dryden, Conquest of Granada, l. 1.

The ambassador walked on foot, with two country Christians on one hand, and Gentil his French servant on the other.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 508.

6. The mode of using the hand; touch; hence, skill in doing something with the hands, as controlling a horse by drawing upon the bit with the reins.

Many will fish for the Gudgeon by hand, with a running line upon the ground, without a cork, as a Trout is fished for: and it is an excellent way, if you have a gentle rod, and as gentle a hand. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 171.

A friend of mine has a very fine hand on the violin.

Addison.

Her hair was cut and dressed by the best hand, her clothes put on with care.

Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, l.

The hand for crust which is denied to many cooks and cannot be learned.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 197.

A jockey must therefore, more than any other civilian rider, have a hand for all sorts of horses, and in the case of two or three year olds a very good hand it must be.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 199.

Riding with very severe bits, the cow-boy has necessarily a very light hand. W. Shepherd, Prairie Experiences, p. 35.

7. Performance; handiwork; workmanship.

1 Ki. xiv. 18.

Speak all good you can devise of Caesar, . . . Else shall you not have any hand at all About his funeral.

Shak., J. C., iii. 1.

It costs you no effort, while you are about it, to have a hand in a dozen different reigns.

T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Peth, p. 191.

Of his [Dunstan's] political work indeed we know little, but we can hardly mistake his hand in the solemn proclamation which announced the king's crowning at Kingston.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 275.

10. Possession; power; rule; control; authority: commonly in the plural.

This Contree and Lond of Jerusalem hath ben in many dyverse Naciounes Handes.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 74.

Sacraments serve as the moral instruments of God, . . . the use whereof is in our hands, the effect in his.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

The theatre, in proper hands, might certainly be made the school of morality; but now, I am sorry to say it, people seem to go there principally for their entertainment!

Sheridan, The Critic, l. 1.

No difference existed, or indeed could exist, between the position of the various classes of persons under the Hand of a House Father.

W. E. Hearn, Aryan Household, p. 91.

11. In card-playing: (a) The cards held by a single player.

I must complain the cards are ill shuffled till I have a good hand.

Swift, Thoughts on Various Subjects.

An Ace of Hearts steps forth; the King unseen

Lurk'd in her hand. Pope, R. of the L., iii. 96.

I have a difficult hand to play in this affair.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 3.

(b) A single round at a game, in which all the cards dealt at one time are played.

The odd trick at the conclusion of a hand.

A saint in heaven would grieve to see such hand

Cut up by one who will not understand.

Crabbe, The Borough.

(c) One of the players. In whist the eldest hand or elder hand is the player sitting next the dealer in the order in which the cards are dealt; the second hand is the one playing next after the leader in any trick; the third hand is the one after him; and the fourth hand is the last of all. (d) A game at cards.—12. In her, the representation of a human hand, usually couped at the wrist. The blazon always specifies dexter or sinister, appaupee or reversed. Compare badge of Ulster, under badge, and see cut under appaupee.

13. Something resembling the hand in shape or appearance, as in having five or more divisions (fingers), or in use, as in pointing, etc. Specifically—(a) A palmate form of ginger. See the quotation.

Ginger is known in commerce in two distinct forms, termed respectively coated and uncoated ginger, as having or wanting the epidermis. For the first, the pieces, which are called "races" or hands, from their irregular palmate form, are washed and simply dried in the sun.

Encyc. Brit., X. 603.

(b) One of the groups, formed of one or two rows of the fruit arranged athwart the main stem of the bunch, into which a bunch of bananas or plantains naturally divides. A hand may contain from 8 to 20 separate fruits.

From the top and center of the plant [bananas] the fruit appears, and consists of a stock on which are from four to twelve clusters called hands.

U. S. Cons. Rep., No. lxx. (1886), p. 216.

(c) A bundle or head of tobacco-leaves tied together, without being stripped from the stem.

Hands or small bundles of from six to twelve leaves [of tobacco].

Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 425.

(d) Five things sold together, as five oranges or five herrings. (e) A figure like a hand used on sign-posts, etc., to indicate direction, or in print (as SS) to call attention to a particular sentence or paragraph; an index. (f) An index of a clock, watch, or dial of any kind, pointing out its divisions; a pointer: as, the hour- and minute-hands of a clock.

Half-way up the stairs it stands,

And points and beckons with its hands

From its case of massive oak.

Longfellow, Old Clock on the Stairs.

14. One who is engaged in some particular manual employment, as in a factory or on a ship; a workman or workwoman.

In going round the island I saw only two iron mines which are not now worked, because in Cyprus they want hands to cultivate the ground.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. l. 229.

I am sure that he is the last man in England who would desire that the working men in England should continue to remain in reality what they are in name—the mere hands of workshops, without having their heads full of trained intelligence to guide their work.

Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 333.

15. A person as acting in any way or doing any specified thing: as, a good hand at a bargain; all hands gave assistance.

At Parma the theatre is esteemed the finest in the world; and in Palazzo del Giardino are fine paintings by many great hands.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 209.

3. In some parts of Scotland, formerly, to marry provisionally by the ceremony of joining hands. Handfasting was a simple contract or agreement under which cohabitation was permitted for a year, at the end of which time the contract could either be dissolved or made permanent by formal marriage. Such marriages, at first probably not intended to be temporary, are supposed to have originated in Scotland from a scarcity of clergy, and have existed at times in other countries.

We Border-men are more wary than your inland clowns of Rife and Lothian; . . . we take our wives, like our horses, upon trial. When we are handfasted, as we term it, we are man and wife for a year and a day—that space gone by, each may choose another mate, or, at their pleasure, may call the priest to marry them for life—and this we call handfasting.

Scott, Monastery, xxv.

handfast (hand'fäst), a. [Cf. Sw. handfast = Dan. haandfast, a., strong, stout. In defs. 2 and 3, short for handfasted.] 1. Having a close hand; close-fisted. Davies.

Some will say women are covetous: are not men as handfast? Bretton, Praise of Virtuous Ladies, p. 57.

2. Bound by pledge, promise, or contract; especially, betrothed, or united as if by betrothal.

A virgin made handfast to Christ.

Bp. Bale, English Votaries, i. fol. 63 b.

3. In Scotland, formerly, joined in provisional wedlock.

This Isobel was but hand-fast with him, and deceased before the marriage. Pitcairney, Chron. of Scotland, p. 26.

handfast (hand'fäst), n. [< hand + fast, in lit. sense. In def. 3, < handfast, v.] 1. Grip; grasp; hold.

But the ground underfoot being slipperie, with the snow on the side of the hill, they handfast layled.

Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 64.

And can it be that this most perfect creature,

This image of his Maker, well-squard man,

Should leave the handfast that he had of grace,

To fall into a woman's easy arms?

Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, iii. 1.

2. Custody; power of confining or keeping; a holding on security or bail.

If that shepherd be not in hand-fast, let him fly.

Shak., W. T., iv. 3.

3. A pledge, promise, or contract; especially, betrothal.

Here, in Heaven's eye and all Love's sacred powers,

I knit this holy handfast, and with this hand

The heart that owes this hand.

Beau. and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, v. 1.

handfasting (hand'fäs-ting), n. [Verbal n. of handfast, v. Cf. AS. handfastning (= Icel. handfastning, the act of striking hands in pledge or confirmation, = Sw. handfastning = Dan. haandfastning, in early Dan. law the stipulation to be given by the king at his coronation), < hand, hand, + fastning, fastening.] Betrothal or provisional marriage by joining hands. See handfast, v., 3. [Chiefly Scotch.]

handfastly (hand'fäst-li), adv. By a pledge or contract.

The which if the Scotties would most hollie and handfastlie promise, the English would forthwith depart with a quiet armie.

handfish (hand'fish), n. A pediculate fish of the family Antennariidae.

hand-flail (hand'häl), n. Milit., a variety of the war-flail (see flail, 2) meant to be wielded with one hand. It was sometimes entirely of bronze or iron.

hand-float (hand'hlot), n. See float, 9 (c).

handflower-tree (hand'hlo'u'er-tré), n. A large tree of Mexico and Central America, Cheiroste-mon platanoides, belonging to the natural order Sterculiaceæ. It takes its name, as does the genus, which contains only this species, from the hand-shaped or claw-shaped column of stamens in the flowers. These are large and monochlamydeous, with the calyx colored bright-red within. The tree is an object of superstitious veneration to the inhabitants of Mexico, who long supposed that a single tree near Toluca, mentioned in early Mexican history, was the only one in existence. It is now cultivated from slips. Also called hand-tree, hand-plant, and manita.

hand-fly (hand'fli), n. The fly on a casting-line which is nearest the angler's hand.

hand-footed (hand'füt'ed), a. Having feet like hands; chiropod.

hand-glass (hand'gläs), n. 1. In hort., a glass used for covering, protecting, and forwarding plants.—2. A small mirror that may be conveniently held in the hand.—3. Naut., a half-minute or quarter-minute sand-glass used to measure time in running out the log-line.

hand-gout (hand'gout), n. Gout in the hands; chiragra. In the extract the word is used in humorous allusion to "greasing the palm" with money.

But now, sir,

My learned counsel, they must have a feeling;
They'll part, sir, with no books, without the hand-gout
Be oiled; and I must furnish.

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, iii. 1.

hand-grenade (hand'grē-nād'), n. Milit., a small spherical or cylindrical iron shell, about three inches in diameter, filled with powder, lighted by means of a fuse, and thrown by hand.

Hand-grenades were much used in the British naval service throughout the eighteenth century, especially in repelling attacks from boats. They are notably serviceable in the defense of works, in dealing with an enemy at close quarters, when he cannot be covered by the guns or by musketry on the bank. Ketchum's hand-grenade is a small oblong percussion-shell which is exploded by means of a plunger on striking the object against which it is thrown.

Hand-grenade of the 18th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français.") hand-grip (hand'grip), n. [< ME. hand-gripe, < AS. hand-gripe = D. handgriep, grasp, = OHG. hantgrif, G. handgriff, grasp, handle, hilt, = Dan. haandgreb = Sw. handgrepp, handle, hilt.] 1. Seizure with the hand; grip.—2. A handle; a hilt.

The handle or handgrip [of a sword] will be of white shark's skin braided in gold.

New York Semi-weekly Tribune, Aug. 16, 1887.

3. Close grasp or struggle: commonly in the plural.

To all it seems . . . as if the last man of France, who could have swayed these coming troubles, lay there at hand-grips with the unearthly Power.

Carlyle, French Rev., II. iii. 7.

hand-gripe (hand'grīp), n. [< hand + gripe]. Cf. hand-grip.] Seizure with the hand; grip.

Hee that both globes in His own hand-gripe holds.

Sylvestre, Panaretus, I. 1258.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 363.

hand-gyve (hand'jīv), v. t. To shackle the hands of; manacle; fetter. [Rare.]

A poor Legislative, so hard was fate, had let itself be hand-gyved.

Carlyle, French Rev., III. i. 1.

hand-hammer (hand'ham'er), n. A single-handed working-hammer used by blacksmiths, machinists, and boiler-makers: in distinction from the two-handed hammer, or sledge.

hand-harmonica (hand'här-mon'i-kä), n. An accordion.

hand-heat (hand'hēt), n. The natural temperature of the hand.

An important feature is the temperature at which cotton is dyed. In the majority of cases it is worked in the cold, or at a hand-heat, i. e., at about 90° to 100° F.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 222.

handhold (hand'hōld), n. 1. Hold or grasp with the hand. Compare foothold, 1.

With my face to the rock I found my hand-holds and foot-holds down uncanny places.

The Advance, July 21, 1887.

2. The handle of an angler's rod, formed by that part of the butt which is just above the reel: it is often wrapped with velvet, ratan, or cord.

hand-hole (hand'hōl), n. A hole into which the hand may be inserted, as one near the bottom of a steam-boiler, designed to be used in cleaning the boiler, etc. It is closed by a plate.

In tubular boilers the hand-holes should be often opened.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LIV. 20.

hand-hook (hand'hūk), n. A tool used by smiths in twisting bars of iron.

handicap (han'di-kap), n. and a. [Formerly also handycap, handycap; appar. < hand + cap (hand in cap), prob. with ref. to the drawing of lots.] 1. n. 1. An old game at cards, not unlike loo.

To the Miter Tavern in Woodstreete. . . . Here some of us fell to handycap, a sport that I never knew before.

Pepys, Diary, Sept. 13, 1660.

2. In racine and athletics, an extra burden placed upon, or a special requirement made of, a superior competitor in favor of an inferior, in order to make their chances more equal. In a horse-race the handicap is usually an additional weight to be carried by the better horse; in a foot-race, jumping-match, etc., a shorter time, greater distance, or the like, for the superior contestant. The amount of the handicap is adjusted in accordance with the performance of the competitors in previous contests; and in horse-racing regard is had also to the age, sex, and height of the horses. The principle is applied in other contests of agility or skill: thus, in draughts, a superior player is handicapped if he plays against an unskilful or inexperienced player with eleven men to the latter's twelve.

3. A race in which the supposed superiority of certain competitors is counterbalanced by penalties of additional weight, distance, or time imposed on them, or the inferiority of others is compensated by a certain amount of time or distance granted them in starting; any contest or competition in which an allowance of time or distance or other advantage is given to an inferior competitor: as, the Newmarket handicap.

The race . . . showed a heavy entry; . . . public runners were heavily weighted; the nominations included many horses that had never been out before. In one way and another the United Service handicap had grown into the event of the meeting. Whyte Melville, Satanella, xii.

II. a. Noting a contest in which certain competitors are handicapped: as, a handicap race or game.

handicap (han'di-kap), v. t.; pret. and pp. handicapped, ppr. handicapping. [< handicap, n.] 1. To impose, as upon a competitor in a race or other contest, some disadvantage, such as a penalty of additional weight or distance or an allowance of a start or other advantage to an opponent.

The Buckskin Horse . . . was handicapped at 250 pounds for the weight of wagon and driver.

New York Tribune, June 13, 1862.

2. Figuratively, to place at a disadvantage by the imposition of any embarrassment, impediment, or disability: as, handicapped by age, by inexperience, etc.

The tenant is so heavily handicapped that he has no chance in the race.

The Nation, July 1, 1875, p. 7.

An abnormal power of ratiocination, and a prosaic regard for details, have handicapped him from the beginning.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 301.

Art in the old world is handicapped more or less by its own perfection.

N. A. Rev., CXLI. 284.

handicapper (han'di-kap'er), n. One who handicaps; one employed to determine the amount of the handicaps in a contest.

Each competitor is allowed by the official handicapper of the N. C. U. a certain number of yards start, according to the nature of his public performances.

Bury and Hüller, Cycling, p. 41.

handicraft (han'di-kraft), n. and a. [Formerly also handycraft; a corruption, by confusion with handwork, of the earlier handcraft, q. v.] 1. n. 1. Manual labor; hand-work in general.

The full citizens, having become rich, only carried on trade, whilst the handicraft was left exclusively to the poor and the unfree.

English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. cvii.

Specifically—2. Skilled labor with the hands; manual skill or expertness.

Fift Element, of Instruments the haft;

The Tool of Tools, and Hand of Handy-Craft.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Handy-Crafts.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 2.

The Handicraftsmen have not Money to set themselves to work.

Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 41.

The followers of Caxton were for nearly two centuries principally mere handicraftsmen.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xx.

handicuff (han'di-kuf), n. [Usually in pl. handicuffs, < hand + cuff], a blow; the i is inserted, as in fisticuffs, appar. by association with handicraft.] A blow or cuff with the hand. Also spelled handycuff.

Though they owed each other a spite, and had both pretty high spirits, yet they never came to handycuffs.

Arbutnot, Misc. Works (1761), I. 108.

handily (han'di-li), adv. In a handy or expert manner.

When I see women split wood, unload coal-carts, move wash-tubs, and roll barrels of flour and apples handily down cellarways or up into carts, then I shall believe in the sublime theories of the strong-minded sisters.

R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 42.

handiness (han'di-nes), n. 1. The state or character of being handy or expert.

He had a certain tact, . . . which, in connection with his handiness and his orderly ways, caused him at last to become a prime favorite with her.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 252.

The boy made his own traps and small tools and carts, and early learned that handiness and adaptability without which he would be likely to go through life in a destitute condition.

H. E. Souder, Noah Webster, p. 14.

2. Manageableness; convenience; suitability.

Whether improvement is to be in the direction of twin screws, steam steers, or other agencies, it is certain that handiness must increase greatly in modern men-of-war, if the ram and torpedo are to be elements in naval warfare.

Lucie, Seamanship, p. 574.

A signal of great power, handiness, and economy [is] thus placed at the service of our mariners.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 286.

handiron, n. Same as andiron.

handiwork (han'di-wèrk), n. [Formerly also handwork; < ME. handiwerk, handewere, handiwerk, handiwerc, < AS. handgeweorc (= OS. handgewerk), work of the hand, < hand, hand, + geweorc, weorc, work (collectively), < ge-, a collective prefix (see -i-), + weorc, work. Cf. hand-work.] 1. Work done by the hands, and hence by effort of any kind; doing; performance: as, a specimen of one's handiwork; the devil's handiwork.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 201.

2. That which is done or made by the hands, or by any active exertion; a fabrication; a creation.

Vile as I am, and of myself abhor'd,
I am thy handy-work, thy creature, Lord.

Quarles, Emblems, iii. 10.

Our life is only drest

For show: mean handiwork of craftsman, cook, handjar (han'jār), n. [Ar. khanjar, a dagger.] A kind of sword. See the second extract.

Or groom! Wordsworth, London, September, 1802.

Armed with all the weapons of Palikari, handjars and yataghans.

Disraeli, Lothair, lxiii.

A handjar, or broad-bladed, leaf-shaped sword, very similar to the ancient Spanish weapon adopted by the Roman soldiery, or resembling perhaps still more those bronze weapons found upon the old battle-fields of Greece and within early Celtic barrows. These weapons they [Caucasian soldiers] are accustomed to use as projectiles.

O'Donovan, Merv, ii.

handkercher (hang'kèr-chèr), n. [A corruption of handkerchief.] A handkerchief. [Obsolete or vulgar.]

Did your brother tell you how I counterfeited to sound, when he showed me your handkercher?

Shak., As you Like it, v. 2.

Hangnails often persistently renew themselves after they are cut.

hang-nest (hang'nest), n. and a. I. n. 1. A pensile, pendulous, or hanging nest.—2. A hangbird or hanging-bird. [In this sense better as hangnest.]

II. a. Building a hanging nest: an epithet applied to sundry hangbirds.

hang-net (hang'net), n. A net with a large mesh.

hangwite, n. [A legal term, quoted as AS. in Latin documents of Edward the Confessor (hangwite, hengenwite, once each) and William the Conqueror (henwite, for hengwite, as in the AE. version), meaning in the latter instance, and prob. in the former instances, a fine for allowing a criminal to escape from prison. The proper AS. form would be hengenwite* (it could not be hangwite*), < hengen, prison, confinement (prob. at first in stocks or pillory), also a cross, a gibbet, and, abstractly, hanging (= OS. heng-inna, hanging—on the cross) (< hön, pp. hangen, hang), + wite, fine, penalty. Cf. AS. hengen-witung, the penalty of imprisonment, imprisonment.] In Anglo-Saxon law, a fine for allowing a prisoner to escape from custody. [Otherwise explained as a fine for having hanged a thief without judgment, but this is doubtful. See etymology.]

hang-worm (hang'wêrm), n. Same as drop-worm (b).

hang-worthy (hang'wêr'wôthi), a. Deserving death by hanging.

Rebels, whose naughty minds could not trust so much to the goodness of their prince as to lay their hang-worthy necks upon the constancy of his promised pardon.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

hanif (ha-nêf'), n. [Ar. hanîf, orthodox: cf. hanâfi.] One who, before the appearance of Mohammed, was disinclined to idolatry and expectant of a new religion: especially applied to Abraham in the Koran; hence, also, one sincere in the faith of Islam.

[Abraham] have turned my face to Him who originated the heaven and the earth, as a hanîf, and I am not of the idolaters.
Koran, quoted in Hughes's Dict. of Islam, p. 102.

Hanifite, n. and a. Same as Hanafite.

hanifitism (han'î-fi-tizm), n. [< Hanifite + -ism.] The doctrine or beliefs held by the hanifs. See hanîf.

Hanifitism was remarkably widely diffused among them [men of Medina], and at the same time there were movements of expectation of a new religion, perhaps even of an Arabian Messiah, who should found it.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 551.

hank¹ (hangk), n. [ME. only in verb hanken, fetter; < Icel. hönk (gen. hankar), a hank, coil, skein, hanki, the hasp of a chest, pulleys or blocks for brailing up a sail, = Sw. hank, a string, tie-band, rowel, = Dan. hank, handle, ear (Norw., hank, ring), = G. dim. henkel, handle, ear, ring, hook; closely connected with Icel. hangr, a hank, coil, hang, the coil of a snake, being from the verb hang, Icel. hanga, etc. Cf. hanker.] 1. A skein or coil of yarn or thread; more particularly, a definite length of yarn, thread, silk, or the like bound up in one or more skeins. A hank of cotton yarn is 840 yards; a hank of linen yarn is 3,000 yards.—2. A string; a tie; a clasp; a hold; a collar, chain, ring, or other means of fastening.

An old native fisherman, however, brought up a hank of very small and uninviting fishes after them.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 132.

Is it known what was the fourth pendant [of a bracelet], of which the silver hank only now remains?
N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 153.

Specifically—3. Naut., a ring of wood or iron (formerly of rope) fastened round a fore-and-aft stay, and having the head of a jib or stay-sail seized to it. Iron hanks are used on wire stays, and wooden ones on rope stays.

A longdrawn cry and a rattling of hanks announce that the flying-jib has come in.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 410.

4. A withy or rope for fastening a gate. [Local, Eng.]-5. A handle. [Prov. Eng.]-Hank for hank (naut.), in the same relative position: said of two ships which tack and make progress together: as, the Vulture and Mercury turned up the river hank for hank, neither being able to get to windward of the other.—To get or have a hank on or upon one, or to have one upon the hank, to get or have one entangled.

Others had no certainty of their holds, which were wont to be let by copy for lives, or otherwise for years; so that their landlords might have them upon the hank at no time, nor in any thing, to offend them.
Styrie, Memorials, Edw. VI., an. 1549.

For if you side for love or money
With crows that have so oft undone ye,
The dev'l will get a hank upon ye.
Rudibras Redivivus.

hanseatic (han-sē-at'ik), a. [< hanse¹ + -at-ic.] Pertaining to a hanse or league; specifically [cap.], pertaining or relating to the league of the Hanse towns.—Hanseatic league, or the German Hanse, or Hansa, a medieval confederation of cities of northern Germany and adjacent countries, called the Hanse towns, at one time numbering about ninety, with affiliated cities in nearly all parts of Europe, for the promotion of commerce by sea and land, and for its protection against pirates, robbers, and hostile governments. At the height of its prosperity it exercised sovereign powers, made treaties, and often enforced its claims by arms in Scandinavia, England, Portugal, and elsewhere. Its origin is commonly dated from a compact between Hamburg and Lübeck in 1241, although commercial unions of German towns had existed previously. The league held triennial general assemblies, usually at Lübeck, its chief seat; and after a long period of decline, and attempts at resuscitation, the last general assembly, representing six cities, was held in 1660. The name was retained, however, by the union of the free cities of Lübeck, Hamburg, and Bremen, which are now members of the German empire.

hanse-house (hans'houz), n. Formerly, in England, a house used by a corporation of merchants for the display and sale of goods.

In some places in England there were hanse-houses, which were probably used as the headquarters of these great sales or fairs, just as very many parishes used to have a so-called "Church House" for public purposes.

English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 357, note.

(Rafinesque, 1819), < Gr. ἀπλόος, simple, + ὄντις, in sense of 'second,' + ὄντος, back, i. e., dorsal fin.] A genus of scienoid fishes peculiar to the great fresh-water lakes and the Mississippi valley, typical of the subfamily Haplodontinae, represented by H. grunniens, the fresh-water drum, sheephead, or thunder-pumper. Also called Ambodon.

Haplodon (hap'lō-don), n. [NL., written in various forms (see def. 1), but prop. only Haploodon or Haplodon, Haploödon or Hapludus, < Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + ὄδους (ὄδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. The typical and only genus of rodents of the family Haplodontidae. H. rufus or Aplodontia leporina is the sewellel or Rocky Mountain beaver. Also Sewellel (Haplodon rufus).

Haploödon, Hapludon, Hapludon, Hapludus, Haploödis, Haploudis, Hapludis, and in extended form Aplodontia, Aplodontia, Aplodontia, Aplodontia, Aplodontia. The original form in mammalogy, Aplodontia (Richardson, 1829), was emended to Haplodon by Wagner (1830).

2. A genus of elasmobranchiate fishes. Münster, 1840.

haplodont (hap'lō-dont), a. and n. [Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + ὄδους (ὄδοντ-) = E. tooth.] I. a. 1. In odontog., having the crowns of the molar teeth simple or single—that is, not divided into ridges, tubercles, etc.—2. In zool.: (a.) Pertaining to the Haplodontidae. (b.) Pertaining to the Haplodontia; edentate.

II. n. One of the Haplodontidae. Haplodontia¹ (hap-lō-don'ti-ä), n. [NL., fem. sing.: see Haplodon.] Same as Haplodon.

Haplodontia² (hap-lō-don'ti-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of haplodont (-): see haplodont.] An order of placental Mammalia, consisting of the Edentata of Cuvier with the omission of the Monotremata; one of two orders constituting Blyth's phytophagous mammals. [Not in use.]

Haplodontidae (hap-lō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haplodont (-) + -idae.] A family of rodents, typified by the genus Haplodon and nearly related to the Castoridae or beavers; the sewellels. They have 1 incisor on each side above and below, no canines, 2 premolars in each upper and 1 in each lower half-jaw, and 3 molars on both sides above and below, the molars being rootless, prismatic in section, and with simple crowns. The clavicles are perfect; the tibia and fibula are not ankylous; there are 9 carpal and 9 tarsal bones; the skull is massive, greatly depressed, broad behind, and with flaring zygomatic and no postorbital processes; the mandible is massive, with a twisted, laminar, descending ramus and a high coronoid process; there is a large hyoid bone; the salivary glands are enormous; the stomach has a cardiac prolongation; the intestine is about eleven times longer than the body; the cecum is large; the outlets of the genital and urinary organs are separate; the testes are abdominal; and the large penis-bone is cleft at the end. They are peculiar to North America. See sewellel, and cut under Haplodon.

haplogonidium (hap'lō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. haplogonidia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἀπλόος, simple, + NL. gonidium.] See gonidium, 3.

haplogonium (hap'lō-gō-nim'i-um), n.; pl. haplogonia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἀπλόος, simple, + NL. gonium.] See gonidium, 3, and gonium. Crombie.

haplography (hap-log'ra-fi), n. [Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] In paleography and textual criticism: (a.) A copyist's mechanical or inadvertent omission of a letter, or of a series of letters or words, repeated in immediate succession in the passage of the original manuscript copied. Errors of this kind were frequently made by ancient copyists, owing to non-separation of words in manuscripts. An example in English would be, if in copying ANDISSENTTOYOU ('and is sent to you'), one s should be dropped, so as to read, 'and I sent to you.' (b.) A reading originating in such an omission. See ditto-graphy.

Haplolanæ (hap-lō-lē-nē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + (?) λάων, of stone, < λαός, a stone.] A tribe of frondose liverworts (Hepaticæ), of the division Jungermanniacea, proposed by Nees von Esenbeck in 1838, and characterized by a one-leaved involucre without any true perianth, a spherical capsule, and dichotomous-ribbed fronds. It comprises some of the finest of the frondose liverworts.

haploma (hap-lō-mä), n. [Gr. ἀπλωμα, a cloth or coverlet: see haplome.] Same as ependytes (b.).

haplome (hap'lōm), n. [Orig., but less prop., aprome (Häufy, 1801); < Gr. ἀπλωμα, that which is unfolded, an expanse, also a table-cloth or coverlet, < ἀπλῶν, unfold, make single, < ἀπλόος, contr. ἀπλούς, simple, single, < ἀ- copulative + -πλός, -fold: see diploë, diploima, etc.] A rare variety of garnet, found in dodecahedrons with rhombic faces.

Haploromorpha (hap-lō-mōr'fä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of haploromorphus: see haploromorphous.]

1. In some systems of classification, a group of true craspedote medusans, typical aculephs, or ordinary jelly-fishes, corresponding nearly or exactly with Hydrophora of some and Trachymedusæ of other writers. See Trachymedusæ.—2. A division of opisthobranchiate gastropods, of small size and simple form, having no ctenidia, cerata, or other processes of the body-wall. The families Phyllirrhoidæ and Elysiidæ represent this division: same as Abranchia (b.).

haploromphic (hap-lō-mōr'fik), a. [Gr. Haploromorpha + -ic.] Same as haploromorphous.

They are now mostly regarded as representing certain immature stages in the life-history of other higher forms, particularly the Ascomycetes.

haplomycetous (hap'lō-mi-sē'tus), a. Having the structure or appearance of the Haplomycetæ.

Haploöphonæ (hap'lō-ō-fō-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + φωνή, voice, sound.] 1. In J. Müller's system of classification, a group of passerine birds having a simple bronchotracheal syrinx, as the tyrant-flycatchers: it corresponds to Clamatores or Oligomyodi and is contrasted with Tracheophonæ.—2. In Garrod and Forbes's arrangement, a division of Passeres, consisting of the family Tyrannidae and the genus Rupicola of South America, together with the old-world Pittidae, Phileptidae, and Xenicidae (or Acanthisittidae): opposed to Tracheophonæ.

haploöphonous (hap'lō-ō-fō-nus), a. [As Haploöphonæ + -ous.] Having the characters of the Haploöphonæ; oligomyodian.

Haplopappus (hap-lō-pap'us), n. [NL., also less prop. Aporpappus, < Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + πάππος, seed-down (pappus): see pappus.] A large genus of Compositæ, chiefly of western North America and Chili, with yellow flowers. It is allied to Solidago, but has larger many-flowered heads, and is of very different habits. There are about 50 species in the United States, of which only 2 are found east of the Mississippi. They are of no known economic value. A Mexican species, A. discoides, furnishes a kind of damiana, a pretended aphrodisiac. Cassini, 1828.

haplopetalous (hap-lō-pet'a-lus), a. [Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + πέταλον, leaf (petal).] In bot., having only one row or circle of petals.

haplosiphoniate (hap'lō-si-fō-ni-ät), a. [Gr. Haplosiphonia (see def.), < Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + σίφων, siphon.] Pertaining to or having the characters of that series of batrachians known as Aglossa haplosiphonia. See Aglossa.

Haplostemma (hap-lō-stem'm), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀπλόος, simple, + στέμμα, wreath, crown.] A division of the natural order of plants Asclepiadeæ, having the crown of stamens simple and consisting of five entire or slightly bifid pieces inserted on the base of the gynostegium. Decaisne, 1844.

haplostemonous (hap-lō-stem'ō-nus), a. [Gr. ἀπλόος, single, + στέμνω, a thread: see stamen.] In bot., having a single series or circle of stamens. Also aplostemonous.

Sir K. Digby.

=Syn. 1. Haply, Happily. Haply, now rarely used in prose, means by chance; happily, by a happy chance.—2. Prosperously; successfully; contentedly.

happiness (hap'i-ness), n. [< happy + -ness.] The state or quality of being happy. (a) Good luck; good fortune.

Might we but have that happiness, my lord, that you would once use our hearts, whereby we might express some part of our zeals, we should think ourselves for ever perfect.

Shak., T. of A., i. 2.

(b) Any state of being, having considerable permanence, in which pleasure decidedly predominates over pain.

Dead and inglorious,

Like beast whose breath but in his nostrils is,

And hath no hope of happiness or bliss.

Spenser, Ruins of Time, i. 358.

O happiness, our being's end and aim! Good, pleasure, ease, content, whatever thy name; That something still which prompts the eternal sigh, For which we bear to live, or dare to die!

Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 1.

Happiness, . . . in its full extent, is the utmost pleasure we are capable of.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. 42.

The word happy is a relative term; in strictness, any condition may be denominated happy in which the amount or aggregate of pleasure exceeds that of pain; and the degree of happiness depends upon the quantity of this excess.

Paley, Moral Philos., i. 6.

Every man speaks of happiness as his end of ends: he wishes to live well or to do well, which he considers to be the same as being happy. But men disagree exceedingly in their opinions as to that which constitutes happiness: nay, the same man sometimes places it in one thing, sometimes in another—in health or in riches, according as he happens to be sick or poor.

Grote, Aristotle.

(c) Fortuitous aptness or fitness; an unstudied grace or beauty; felicitousness.

How pregnant sometimes his replies are! a happiness that often madness hits on.

Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

Sir J. Denham.

Ye powers who rule the tongue, if such there are, And make colloquial happiness your care.

Cowper, Conversation, i. 82.

Both show a wide knowledge of human nature, and a great happiness in sketching the details of individual manners.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., i. 77.

=Syn. Happiness, Felicity, Blessedness, Bliss; well-being, prosperity, welfare, enjoyment, comfort, security. Happiness, the generic word, is expressive of nearly every general state of pleasure. It is so far from its derivation that it is often expressive of that state of mind that triumphs over circumstances, finding material for contentment or even joy in that which might naturally produce deep unhappiness. Felicity is primarily a matter of favorable circumstances, which may be mere exemption from disaster or disagreeable experiences, or may be of a higher type, as domestic felicity depends not merely upon the comfort of the home, nor upon freedom from anxiety, but especially upon a high degree of mutual love. Blessedness is a state of the most refined happiness, arising from the purest and warmest benevolent and religious feeling. The type of its meaning is furnished by the use of the word blessed in the beatitudes, Mat. v. 3-11. Bliss is consummate happiness. See animation, mirth, hilarity, gladness.

happ'ing (hap'ing), n. [Verbal n. of hap², v.] Same as hap².

happit¹ (hap'it). A Scotch preterit and past participle of hap¹.

Swift.

Happy despatch, family, hunting-ground, etc. See the nouns.—Happy man be his dole! See dole¹.—Syn. Happy, Felicitous, Fortunate, Lucky, Felicitous is now rarely used except in the sense of apt and pleasing, a sense in which happy also is used; as, a felicitous or happy combination, answer, speech. Fortunate and lucky, by their derivations, are a higher and a lower term for the prosperous turns of chance or the lot in life. Happy, though essentially the same by derivation, has a broader application; it is never altogether separated from the idea of enjoyment. See happiness.

happy (hap'i), v. t. [< happy, a.] To make happy.

By th' one hee happied his own Soule with Rest; By th' other also, hee his People blest.

Sylvester, St. Lewis (trans.), i. 75.

hara-kiri (har'ä-kir'ë), n. [Jap., < hara, belly, + kiri, cutting, cut. Erroneously written harikari, harri-karri, in riming conformation.] 1. Suicide by disembowement, formerly practised in Japan by daimios and members of the military class when unwilling to survive some personal or family disgrace, or in order to avoid the headsman's sword after having received sentence of death. In the latter case the act was performed in the presence of witnesses, and was accompanied by elaborate formalities. At the moment the suicide ripped open his abdomen with his dirk his head was struck off by the sword of his second, who was usually a kinsman or an intimate friend.

According to one authority, capital punishment may be divided into two kinds—beheading and strangulation. The ceremony of hara-kiri was added afterwards in the case of persons belonging to the military class being condemned to death. However wise, ye hardly know me yet. Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

4. Barely; narrowly; almost not at all: as, hardly any; hardly ever.

The Earl of Gloucester in a Sickness suddenly lost his Hair, his Teeth, his Nails, and his Brother hardly escaped Death. Baker, Chronicles, p. 86.

Hardly any faculty is more important for the intellectual progress of man than the power of Attention. Darwin, Descent of Man, I. 43.

The country was then impoverished, intercourse with Great Britain was interrupted, school-books were scarce and hardly attainable, and there was no certain prospect of peace. N. Webster, in Scudder, p. 33.

5. Not probably; with little likelihood: as, he will hardly come to-day.

Hardly shall you find any one so bad but he desires the credit of being thought good. South, Sermons.

There was that across his throat Which you had hardly cared to see. Tennyson, Lady Clara Vere de Vere.

hard-metal (hård'met'al), n. An alloy of about two parts of copper with one of tin, prepared in the process of making gun-metal. To this alloy the proper addition of copper is afterward made, the object being to secure a more thorough mixture of the two metals than would be possible if they were melted together in the proper proportions without this preliminary operation.

hardmouth (hård'mouth), n. A cyprinoid fish, Aerocilus alutaceus, distinguished by the incasement of the jaws in a well-defined broad horny plate having a straight edge. It reaches a length of about a foot, and represents in the United States the Chondrostomus of Europe. [Columbia river, U.S.]

hard-mouthed (hård'moutht), a. Having a hard mouth; not sensitive to or easily controlled by the bit: as, a hard-mouthed horse.

'Tis time my hard-mouth'd coursers to controul, Aft to run riot, and transgress the goal. Dryden.

I myself, the author of these momentous truths, am a person whose imaginations are hard-mouthed, and exceedingly disposed to run away with his reason. Swift, Tale of a Tub, ix.

hardness (hård'nes), n. [ME. hardnesse, hardnesse, < AS. hardnes (= OHG. hartznissa), < hård, hard; see hård, a.] 1. The state or quality of being hard, in any of the senses of that word; solidity; density; difficulty of comprehension, accomplishment, control, or endurance; obduracy; harshness; severity; inclemency; adversity; roughness; uncomeliness; want of sensibility.

It one, by quickness of witte, take his lesson readelie, an other, by hardnes of witte, taketh it not so speedilie. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 52.

By their virtuous behaviour they compensate the hardness of their favour. Ray.

With respect to hardness, we know nothing of it by sense farther than that the parts of hard bodies resist the motion of our hands on coming into contact with them. Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), II. § 4.

Specifically—2. That quality in fountain-water which is imparted by the presence in excess of earthy salts, especially calcium sulphate.

It is possible to improve . . . hard water . . . by simply adding lime-water to water the hardness of which is to be corrected. Huxley, Physiography, p. 119.

The hardness shown by unboiled water is called total hardness. Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 135.

3. In med., that quality of the pulse which is due to tension of the artery, which in this condition does not readily yield to the pressure of the finger.

Hardness of the pulse is usually said to be an indication of bleeding, . . . but it is necessary to discriminate carefully between the hardness due to tension of the sound artery . . . and that due to arterial degeneration with more or less hard deposit in the walls of the vessels. Quain, Med. Dict.

4. In art and music, harshness or coldness of execution; unsympathetic treatment, as of a tone or the details of a picture; want of feeling in performance.—5. In mineral., the comparative capacity of a substance to scratch another or be scratched by another; the quality of bodies which enables them to resist abrasion of their surfaces. Scales have been constructed in which a set of standard bodies are arranged and numbered, and other bodies are referred to this scale in respect of hardness. The diamond is the hardest body known, and in the scale of Mohs its hardness is indicated by the number 10. The scale is as follows: Talc, 1; rock-salt, 2; calcite, 3; fluor-spar, 4; apatite, 5; feldspar, 6; rock-crystal, 7; topaz, 8; corundum, 9; diamond, 10.

hard-nosed (hård'noz'd), a. In hunting, having little or no sense of smell: said of dogs.

hardock (hård'ok), n. [ME. or AS. form not found; appar. < early ME. har, AS. hār, E. hoar, + dock, q. v.] A name applied by old English authors to some uncertain plant, probably a dock with whitish leaves, being a corruption of hoardock; perhaps the burdock, Arctium Lappa. It is thought by some to be the same as harlock, which is a corruption of charlock, Brassica Sinapisstrum.

hard-pan (hård'pān), n. 1. The more or less firmly consolidated detrital material which sometimes underlies a superficial covering of soil. Any bed of mingled clay and sand or pebbles, if firmly compacted, is called hard-pan. The use of this word appears to be much more common in the United States than in England.
Hence—2. (a) Hard, unbroken ground. [U. S.]

The new [world] is for the most part yet raw, undigested hard-pan.
The Century, XXVII. 113.

(b) The lowest level; lowest foundation; a firm footing for effort or upward progress: as, prices have reached hard-pan. [U. S.]

The practical hard-pan of business.

It didn't appear to reach hard-pan, or take a firm grip on life.
The Century, XXVI. 285.

Scott, Fair Maid of Perth, v.

hard-set (hård'set'), a. Rigid; inflexible; obstinate.

hard-shell (hård'shel), a. and n. I. a. 1. In zool., having a hard shell. Specifically applied—(a) to the hard clam, round clam, or quagga, Venus mercenaria; (b) to the common edible crab, Callinectes hastatus, when its shell is grown hard: distinguished from soft-shell.

2. Rigidly and narrowly orthodox; conservative; uncompromising. [Colloq., U. S.]

She recognized the drawl of an old hard-shell preacher who at long intervals came to hold forth in the neighborhood.
The Century, XXXVI. 897.

Hard-shell Baptists. See baptist, 2.

II. n. 1. A hard-shelled crab or clam.—2. See Hard, n., 5 (a).

hard-shelled (hård'sheld), a. Same as hard-shell.

Oh, you hard-shelled, unplastic, insulated Englishmen! You introduce towels and fresh water, and tea, and beef-steak, wherever you go, it is true; but you teach high prices, and swindling, and insolence likewise!
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 256.

hardship (hård'ship), n. [ME. herdschipe, also hardschipe; < hard + -ship.] 1. Severe labor or want; suffering or excessive toil, physical or mental; adversity; affliction; also, anything that exacts physical or mental endurance.

They admitted of bondage, with danger of conscience, rather than to endure these hardships.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 23.
Heroes are always drawn bearing sorrows, struggling with adversities, undergoing all kinds of hardships, and having in the service of mankind a kind of appetite to difficulties and dangers.
Spectator, No. 312.

2. Hard treatment; injury; oppression; injustice.

They are ripe for a peace, to enjoy what we have conquered for them; and so are we, to recover the effects of their hardships upon us.
Swift.

=Syn. 1. Trial, burden, grievance, trouble.

hardtack (hård'tak), n. 1. Large, coarse, hard biscuit baked without salt and kiln-dried, much used by sailors and soldiers; ship-biscuit.—2. Same as hardhead, 6. [Georgia, U. S.]

hardtall (hård'täl), n. A carangoid fish, the yellow mackerel, Caranx pisquetus.

hard-visaged (hård'viz'äjd), a. Having harsh features; ill-favored.

hardware (hård'wär), n. 1. Small metal articles, such as house- or carriage-trimmings, fittings, parts of machines, domestic and kitchen utensils and appliances, and small tools. For more convenient classification, such material is called builders' hardware, domestic hardware, carriage-hardware, etc.

2. Alcoholic liquors. [Colloq., Newfoundland.]

hardwareman (hård'wär-mān), n.; pl. hardwaremen (-men). A maker or seller of hardware.

Work for silversmiths, watch-makers, and hardwaremen.
The Century, XXIV. 653.

Hardwickia (hård-wik'i-ä), n. [NL. (Roxburgh, 1795), named after Major-General Thomas Hardwick of the British army.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Leguminosæ, suborder Casalpinieæ, tribe Cynometreæ, characterized by slender paniculate racemes of flowers having 5 strongly imbricated sepals and 10 stamens, 1 to 3 of which are sometimes reduced to staminodia. The genus embraces 4 species, natives of tropical Asia and Africa. They are thornless trees with abruptly pinnate 2- to 6-foliate leaves. Two Asiatic species, H. binata and H. pinnata, are tolerably well known. The former is a deciduous tree attaining a maximum height of 120 feet, and inhabiting southern and central India. The heart-wood is dark reddish-brown or nearly black, fine-grained, very hard, and durable. It is perhaps the heaviest wood in India, splits easily, and does not warp. It is very valuable for posts, railroad-ties, and underground work. The bark furnishes a valuable fiber for cordage. The other species named has similar but less-marked properties. It grows in the western Ghats from South Kanara to Travancore. Both species exude a balsam similar to copiba. That of H. pinnata hardens into a resin, or forms an oleo-resin.

hardwood-tree (hård'wüd-trē), n. A handsome West Indian shrub or small tree, Isora ferrea, belonging to the natural order Rubiaceæ, having oblong, pointed leaves and axillary corymbs of rose-colored flowers. See Isora.

hardy (hård'i), a.; compar. hardier, superl. hardest. [ME. hardy, hardi, < OF. hardi (F. hardi), hardy, daring, stout, bold, usually regarded as the pp. of hardir, ardir (= Pr. ardir = It. ardire), be bold, make bold, < OHG. hart-gan* = E. hard, v.] (cf. OF. enhardi, emboldened, pp. of enhardir, embolden), but perhaps directly < OHG. harti, herti, MHG. herti, another form of OHG. MGH. hart = E. hard; cf. MLG. herdich, persevering, = ODan. hardig = Norw. herdig = Sw. hårdig, vigorous, courageous (Dan. ihårdig = Sw. ihårdig, persevering). Hardy is thus a doublet of hard: see hard, 1. Bold; intrepid; daring; confident; audacious.

But there is no man in the World so hardy, Cristene name other, but that he wolde be adrad for to beholde it.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 252.

That you be never so hardy to come again in his affairs.
Shak., T. N., II. 2.

The Indians were so hardy as they came close up to them, notwithstanding their pieces.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 254.

Be not so hardy, scullion, as to slay
One nobler than thyself.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

2. Requiring or imparting courage, vigor, and endurance; that must be done boldly or energetically: as, a hardy exploit; hardy occupations.

He turned with impatience from his literary tutors to military exercises and the hardest sports.
Motley, Dutch Republic, III. 368.

3. Strong; enduring; capable of resisting fatigue, hardship, or exposure: as, a hardy peasant; a hardy plant.

Lone flower, hemmed in with snows and white as they,
But hardier far.
Wordsworth, Sonnets, II. 16.

And every hardy plant could bear
Loch Katrine's keen and searching air.
Scott, L. of the L., I. 26.

The emigrant's children have grown up, the hardy offspring of the new climate.
Everett, Orations, I. 201.

=Syn. 1. Stout-hearted, courageous, valiant, daring. See note under hardhood, 3. 2. Hale, robust, sturdy, tough.

hardy (hård'i), v. i.; pret. and pp. hardied, ppr. hardying. [cf. hardy, a.] To become hardy, daring, or audacious. [Rare.]

Still hardying more and more in his triumphs over our simplicity.
Lamb, Elia, p. 299.

hardy (hård'i), n.; pl. hardies (-diz). [Origin obscure.] In blacksmithing, a chisel or fuller having a square shank for insertion into a square hole in an anvil.

hardyhead, n. See hardihead.

hardy-shrew (hård'di-shrō), n. [Formerly also hardishrew.] The shrew.

hare (hār), n. [ME. hare, < AS. hara = OFries. hase = MD. haese, D. haas = MLG. hase = OHG. haso, MHG. G. hase = Icel. héri (for heri) = Sw. Dan. hare (< Teut. stem hasan-*) = W. ceinach = OPruss. sasins = Skt. çapa (for casa*), a hare.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the family Leporidae and genus Lepus. It has four upper front teeth instead of only two as usual in Rodentia (the extra pair placed behind the others), long mobile ears, short cocked-up tail, lengthened hind limbs, furry soles, and cleft upper lip. The species are numerous, and are found in most countries, especially of the northern hemisphere; they are much alike, all nearly resembling the common hare of Europe, Lepus timidus. This animal in northerly and alpine countries turns more or less completely white in winter, and is then known as the varying hare. The polar hare, Lepus timidus, var. arcticus or glacialis, is the extreme phase of the same species; the American representative is L. americanus. The western American Varying Hare (Lepus americanus).

United States harbor several very large, long-eared, long-limbed hares, such as L. campestris (which whitens in winter), L. cadicots, and others, commonly known as jack-rabbits or jackass-rabbits. (See under jack-rabbit.) Some hares are partly aquatic, as L. aquaticus of the southern United States. The hare is proverbial for its timidity and fleetness and for its instinctive ingenuity in eluding enemies. The pursuit of it with hounds is called coursing, and has been a favorite sport from remote times. The rabbit, belonging to the same genus, is often included under the general term hare, and differs from it chiefly in its smaller size, and in its habit of burrowing instead of constructing forms in the grass as the hare does. See rabbit.

He is so gode a knyght that alle other be but as heres as in comparison to hym, saf only his brother.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), II. 162.
The melancholy hare is form'd in brakes and briers.
Dryden, Polyolbion, II. 204.

The tim'rous hare . . . scarce shuns me.
Couper, Task, VI. 305.

2. [cap.] In astron., one of the forty-eight ancient constellations of Ptolemy, situated in the southern hemisphere.—First catch your hare. See catch, 1.—Hare and hounds. (a) An outdoor game modeled after the hunting of hares with hounds. Two players known as hares start off on a long run or ride, scattering behind them small pieces of paper called the scent; the others, known as the hounds, following the trail so marked, try to catch the hares before they reach home again.

"Well, my little fellows," began the Doctor, . . . "what makes you so late?" "Please, sir, we've been out Big-side Hare-and-hounds, and lost our way."

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, I. 7.

(b) Everybody; people generally.

But Antenor, he shal come hom to toune,
And she shal out—thus seyde here and hounne.
Chaucer, Troilus, IV. 210.

Little chief hare. See Lagomys and pika.—Mad as a March hare, acting wildly or senselessly; strangely freakish: in allusion to the wild actions of the hare during the breeding-season in spring.—To hunt for hares with a tabort, to engage in a hopeless task. Davies.

Men mygten as well haue huntyd an hare with a tabre,
As aske any mendis for that thei mysdeide.
Richard the Redeless, l. 58.

The poor man that gives but his bare fee, or perhaps pleads in forma pauperis, he hunteth for hares with a taber, and gropeth in the dark to find a needle in a bottle of hay. Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier (Harl. Misc., V. 407).

To make a hare of, to hoax or fool; to ridicule; or expose or show up to derision. (See also calling-hare.)

hare (hār), v. t. [= E. dial. harr, < ME. harren, harren, drag by force, ill-treat; either the same as harren for herien, hergien, E. harry, q. v., or < OF. harier, harry, hurry, trouble, disturb, importune, annoy; perhaps also confused with OF. harer (un chien), set (a dog) on, encourage; cf. haro, harrow, an exclamation; crier haro, cry harrow: see harrow.] To harass; worry; frighten.

I the name of men or beasts, what do you do?
Hare the poor fellow out of his five wits
And seven senses.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, II. I.

But the poor creature was so hared by the council of officers that he presently caused a proclamation to be issued out, by which he did declare the parliament to be dissolved.

Clarendon, Civil Wars, III. 680.

To hare and rate them thus at every turn is not to teach them, but to vex and torment them to no purpose.

Locke, Education, § 87.

hare³⁴, pron. See *hel*¹, I., D (b).

harebell (hâr'bel), n. [ME. harebelle, glossing L. bursa pastoris, shepherd's-purse (not in AS.); < *hare*¹ + bell. Many plants take their popular names from familiar animals without obvious reason; cf. harefoot, hare's-foot, hare-mint, hare's-ear, etc.] 1. A species of bell-flower, Campanula rotundifolia, the well-known bluebell of Scotland. It is a low herb with delicate, drooping, blue, bell-shaped flowers, and linear-lanceolate stem-leaves, those near the root being round-heart-shaped or ovate, but early disappearing, so as rarely to be seen with the flowers. It is common to both Europe and North America. The name is sometimes erroneously written hairbell; Lindley endeavored to restrict that spelling to this plant, reserving the spelling harebell for the Scilla nutans (def. 2).

Harebell, or Bluebell (Campanula rotundifolia).

The azur'd hare-bell, like thy veins.

Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2.

'E'en the slight hare-bell raised its head,
Elastic, from her airy tread.

Scott, L. of the L., i. 18.

An Alpine harebell hung with tears
By some cold morning glacier.

Tennyson, Princess, vii.

2. The wild hyacinth, Scilla nutans, or Hyacinthus non-scriptus. [Scotch; rarely so used in English works.]

harebrain (hâr'brân), a. and n. [*hare*¹ + brain. Also written, incorrectly, hairbrain, as if < *hair*¹ + brain.] 1. a. Same as harebrained.

I mean it (saith the king) by that same hare-braine wild fellow, my subject, the Earle of Suffolk, who is protected in your countrie, and begins to play the foole, when all others are wearie of it.

Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 223.

It certainly will not put him in a position to carry out any of the hairbrain schemes of economic policy.

The American, XII. 309.

II. n. A giddy or reckless person.

Ah foolish harebraine,

This is not she. Udall, Roister Doister, i. 4.

Look into our histories, and you shall almost meet with no other subject, but what a company of hare-brains have done in their rage.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 169.

harebrained (hâr'brând), a. [*hare*¹ + brain + -ed.] 2. Also written, incorrectly, hairbrained.] Having or indicating, as it were, no more brain than a hare; giddy; heedless; reckless; wild.

O painted foolies, whose hairbrained heades must have More clothes attones than might become a king.

Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 70.

Grave and wise persons . . . are extremely less affected with lust and loves than the hare-brained bachelors.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 718.

The hare-brained chatter of a few political babblers.

C. Marvin, Gates of Herat, v.

harebrainedly (hâr'brând-li), adv. In a giddy, wild, or heedless manner.

Fansie (quoth he) farewell, whose badge I long did beare,
And in my hat full harebrainedly thus flowers did I weare.

The only species is H. glacialis, the long-tailed duck, a very common bird of the northern hemisphere, also called oldwife, old-squaw, and south-southerly. The genus has also been named Pagonetta, Crymonessa, and Melonetta.

harelip (hâr'lip'), n. 1. A congenital fissure or vertical division of the upper lip: so called from its supposed resemblance to the lip of a hare. The cleft is occasionally double, there being a little lobe or portion of the lip situated between the two fissures. It is surgically treated by smoothly paring the opposite edges of the fissure, and maintaining them in accurate apposition by a twisted suture until they have united.

This is the foul fiend Filibertigibbet. He begins at curfew, and walks till the first cock. He . . . squints the eye and makes the hare-lip.

Shak., Lear, III. 4.

2. The hare-lipped sucker, Quassilabia lacera, a catostomid fish remarkable for the conformation of the mouth, which suggests a harelip. The upper lip is not protracile, but is greatly enlarged, and the lower lip is divided into two separate lobes. It is abundant in the Scioto and a few other rivers in the Ohio valley and southward.

harelipped (hâr'lip't), a. Having a harelip. hareem (hâr'em or hâr'em), n. [Also haram; < Turk. hareem, < Ar. harâm, anything forbidden, a sacred place or thing, in particular women's apartments, women, allied to Ar. harma, a lady (pl. harim; el harim, the female sex, whence the occasional E. form harim, hareem), < harama, prohibit, forbid.] 1. In Turkey, Egypt, Syria, etc., the part of a dwelling-house, including an inclosed courtyard, appropriated to the female members of a Mohammedan family, and so constructed as to secure the utmost seclusion and privacy. In India the corresponding chambers, offices, and inclosure are called the zenana.

This Duke here, and in other seralios (or Harems, as the Persians term them) has above 300 concubines.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 139.

2. Collectively, the occupants of a harem, consisting in a Mohammedan family of the wife, or wives (usually to the number of four), female relatives of the husband, female slaves or concubines, and sometimes eunuchs as guardians and attendants.

Seraglios sing, and harems dance for joy.

Cowper, Anti-Thelyphora, I. 108.

harm (härm), n. [< ME. harm, herm, < AS. hearm = OS. harm = OFries. herm (in comp.) = MLG. harm, herm = OHG. haram, insult, mortification, MHG. harm (not used), G. harm, grief, sorrow, = Icel. harmr, grief, = Sw. harm, anger, grief, pity, = Dan. harme, resentment, wrath; prob. = OBulg. sramu = Russ. srame, shame; perhaps = Skt. grama, weariness, toil, < √ gram, be weary.] 1. Physical or material injury; hurt; damage; detriment.

Feire some Gawein, be stille and wepe no more, for I haue not the harme that I sholde dye fore, but hurte I am right sore. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), II. 300.

Do thyself no harm.

Acts xvi. 28.

It was to admiration, that in such a tempest (than which I never observed a greater) so little harm was done, and no person hurt. Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 430.

2. Moral injury; evil; mischief; wrong; wrongfulness.

For who that loketh all tofore,

And woll not see what is behynde,

He maie full ofte his harmes finde.

Gower, Conf. Amant, v.

The fault unknown is as a thought unacted;

A little harm done to a great good end

For lawfull policy remains enacted.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 528.

What good should follow this, if this were done?

What harm, undone? Deep harm to disobey,

Seeing obedience is the bond of rule.

Tennyson, Passing of Arthur.

Grievous bodily harm, in law. See grievous. — Syn. 1. Damage, Hurt, etc. (see injury); prejudice, disadvantage.

harm (härm), v. t. [< ME. harmen, hermen, harmien, < AS. hearmian, hurt, injure, = OHG. harmān, MHG. hermen, insult, calumniate, G. härmen, afflict, grieve, = Icel. harma, bewail, refl. harmask = Sw. harmas = Dan. harmes, be vexed; from the noun.] To injure; damage; inflict injury upon in any way; be detrimental to.

Adders that harmen alle hende bestis.

Richard the Redeless, iii. 17.

We may yet prove successful in our endeavours to live peaceably, and may be hated, harmed, and disquieted in our course of life.

Barrow, Works, l. xxx.

Such extremes, I told her, well might harm

The woman's cause.

Tennyson, Princess, iii.

harmala (här'ma-lä), n. [NL.: see harmel.] Same as harmel.

harmala-red (här'ma-lä-red), n. A dye made from harmaline.

harmaline (här'ma-lin), n. [< harmala + -ine]. A vegetable alkaloid derived from the husks of the seeds of the harmel, Peganum Harmala. Its chemical formula is C₁₃H₁₄N₂O. It makes a valuable dye, the harmala-red of commerce.

harman (här'man), n. [See harman-beak, beck-harman.] 1. pl. The stocks. Halliwel.

To put our stamps [legs] in the *Harman*s.

Dekker, quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 230.

2. A constable. [Cant.]

The worst have an awe of the harman's claw,

And the best will avoid the trap.

Bulwer, The Disowned, ii.

harman-beakt, harman-beckt (här'man-bäk, -bek), n. Same as beck-harman. Scott. [Thieves' cant.]

harmattan (här-mat'an), n. [Ar. name.] An intensely dry land-wind felt on the coast of Africa between Cape Verd and Cape Lopez. It prevails at intervals during December, January, and February, and is charged with a thick dust which obscures the sun; it withers vegetation and dries up the skin of the human body. During the prevalence of the harmattan the middle of the day is characterized by great heat, while the nights are unusually cool. Also spelled hermatan.

The hot Harmattan wind had raged itself out; its howl went silent within me; the long deafened soul could now hear.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus.

The harmattan is known to raise clouds of dust high into the atmosphere.

Darwin, Voyage of Beagle, l. 6.

harmel (här'mel), n. [< NL. harmala, < Ar. harmal.] The Syrian or African rue, Peganum Harmala, from the husks of the seeds of which harmaline is extracted. It is a strong-scented branching herb, with sessile entire or divided leaves provided with filiform stipules, and white flowers with green stripes. The species is widely distributed throughout the Mediterranean region and southern Asia. The seeds are also used medicinally as a vermifuge.

harmful (härm'fúl), a. [*< ME. harmful, < AS. harmful (in comp. harmfullig) (= G. harm-voll, full of grief, = Dan. harmfuld = Sw. harmfull, indignant, < hearm, harm, + ful, full: see -ful).] Full of harm; hurtful; injurious; noxious; detrimental; mischievous.

What monsters must here,
With Angels face, and harmful hell! [ish hurts!]

Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 82.

These, while they are afraid of every thing, bring themselves and the churches in the greatest and most harmful hazards.

Styrie, Abp. Parker, an. 1672.

Let . . . me and my harmful love go by.

Tennyson, Maud, xiv.

=Syn. Pernicious, baneful, deleterious, prejudicial.

harmfully (härm'fúl-i), adv. In a harmful manner.

A scholar . . . is better occupied in playing or sleeping than in spending time, not onlie vainlie, but also harm- fullie, in such a kinde of exercise.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, ii.

harmfulness (härm'fúl-nes), n. The quality or state of being harmful.

harmin, harmine (här'mín), n. [< harm(ala) + -in, -ine. Cf. harmaline.] A substance (C₁₃H₁₂N₂O) derived from harmaline by oxidation, or directly from the seeds of Peganum Harmala.

harmless (härm'les), a. [< ME. harmles (= G. harmlos = Dan. Sw. harmlös); < harm + -less.] 1. Free from physical harm; unhurt; undamaged; uninjured: as, he escaped harmless.

And was sayd harmlesse by myracle, for the fyer changed in to rosis.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 47.

2. Free from loss; free from liability to pay for loss or damage: as, to hold or save one harmless.

The shipwright will be careful to gain by his labour, or at least to save himself harmless.

Raleigh.

3. Free from power or disposition to harm; not hurtful or injurious; innocent: as, a harmless snake; harmless play.

By our suffering its [sin's] continual approaches, it begins to appear to us in a more harmless shape.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xxiii.

Amidst his harmless easy joys

No anxious care invades his health.

Dryden, tr. of Horace's Epistles, ii.

The rabbit fondles his own harmless face.

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

To bear one harmless, to warrant one's safety. — Syn. 1. Unharmd. — 3. Inoffensive, unoffending, innocuous, innoxious.

harmlessly (härm'les-li), adv. In a harmless manner; without inflicting or receiving injury.

Religion does not censure or exclude Unnumbered pleasures harmlessly pursued.

Cowper, Retirement, l. 784.

harmlessness (härm'les-nes), n. The character or state of being harmless.

But I dare, sir, avow that the harmlessness of our principles is not more legible in our profession than in our practices and sufferings.

Boyle, Works, v. 285.

To cut off all occasion of suspicion as touching the harmlessness of his doctrines, he would willingly give any one the notes of all his sermons.

Southey, Bunyan, p. 49.

harmonia (här-mō'ni-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀρμονία, harmony. The genera so called are named after Harmonia in Gr. myth., daughter of Ares (Mars) and Aphrodite (Venus), and wife of Cadmus: see harmony.] 1. In anat., a kind of suture between two immovable bones which are apposed and fitted to each other by a border or narrow surface plane and smooth or nearly so, as that between opposite maxillary or palatal bones. The name is applicable both to the mode of suturing and to the suture thus made. Also called harmony.

The outer and lower edge of which [the basisphenoid] joins, by a sort of harmonia, with the inner and lower edge of the tympanic.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 376.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of ladybirds, of the family Coccinellidae, containing such as H. picta.

Mulsant, 1846. — 3. [cap.] A genus of crustaceans. Haswell, 1879.

harmonic (här-mon'ik), a. and n. [= F. harmonique = Pr. armonico = Pg. armonico = Sp. armónico = It. armonico (cf. D. G. harmonisch = Dan. Sw. harmonisk), < L. harmonicus; < Gr. ἀρμονικός, harmonic, musical, suitable (ῥὰ ἀρμονικὰ or ῥὰ ἀρμονικῶς, the theory of sounds, music), < ἀρμονία, harmony: see harmony.] I. a. 1. Per-

2. The mathematical theory of harmonics (see harmonic, n., 2), or the development of expressions for the Newtonian potentials.

harmonious (här-mō'ni-us), a. [= F. harmonieux = Pg. harmonioso = Sp. It. armonioso, < L. harmonia, harmony: see harmony.] 1. Exhibiting harmony or being in harmony; having parts, forms, relations, or proportions properly accordant each with the others, so that all taken together constitute a consistent or an esthetically pleasing whole; also, being in harmony or concord with something else; congruous.

What is harmonious and proportionable is true.
Shaftesbury, Misc. Reflections, iii. 2.

God hath made the intellectual world harmonious and beautiful without us.
Locke.

2. Specifically, in music, concordant; consonant; symphonious; agreeable to the ear. See harmony.

Thoughts, that voluntary move Harmonious numbers. Milton, P. L., iii. 38.

The Samian's great Æolian lyre, . . .
Its wondrous and harmonious strings
In sweet vibration, sphere by sphere.
Longfellow, Occultation of Orion.

3. Marked by harmony in action or feeling; acting or living in concord; peaceable; friendly: as, harmonious government; a harmonious family.

And in the long harmonious years . . .
May some dim touch of earthly things
Surprise thee ranging with thy peers.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xlv.

Harmonious motion, the motion of a vibrating body.

For harmonious motion the ears were made.
Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

=Syn. 2. Melodious, dulcet, tuneful.—3. Amicable, brotherly, neighborly, cordial.

harmoniously (här-mō'ni-us-li), adv. In a harmonious manner; with harmony; with accord or concord.

harmoniousness (här-mō'ni-us-nes), n. The character or condition of being harmonious.

harmoniphon (här-mon'i-fon), n. [Gr. ἀρμόνια, harmony, + φωνή, sound.] A musical instrument consisting of a series of free metallic reeds inserted in a tube like that of a clarinet, the wind being supplied by the breath through a mouthpiece, and its admission to the reeds being controlled by a keyboard like that of the pianoforte.

harmonisation, harmonise, etc. See harmonization, etc.

harmonist (har'mō-nist), n. [Gr. harmon-y + -ist.] 1. One skilled in the principles of musical harmony; also, a musical composer.

The towering headlands, crowned with mist,
Their feet among the billows, know
That Ocean is a mighty harmonist.
Wordsworth, Power of Sound, xii.

A musician may be a very skilful harmonist and yet be deficient in the talents of melody, air, and expression.
Adam Smith, The Imitative Arts, ii.

2. pl. Same as harmonici.—3. One who shows the agreement or harmony between corresponding passages of different authors; specifically, a writer of a harmony of the four gospels.

Out of a dread to admit the slightest inaccuracies in the Gospels, the Harmonists convert the evangelical history into a grotesque piece of mosaic.
G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 406.

4. [cap.] A member of a communistic religious body organized by George Rapp in Württemberg on the model of the primitive church, and conducted by him to Pennsylvania in 1803; their settlement there was called Harmony (whence their name). They removed to New Harmony in Indiana in 1815, but returned to Pennsylvania in 1825, and formed the township of Economy on the Ohio near Pittsburgh, and later a new village of Harmony. They are communistic, holding all property in common; they discourage strongly marriage and sexual intercourse, hold that the second coming of Christ and the millennium are near at hand, and that ultimately the whole human race will be saved. Also called Rappist and Economyite.

harmonistic (här-mō-nis'tik), a. [Gr. harmonist + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of harmony. Specifically—2. Pertaining to a harmony or reconciliation of apparently conflicting passages, as in different literary works, systems of law, etc.

The effect of the harmonistic assumption . . . is to lead to a mechanical combination of two or more relations.
G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 405.

The systematization of the law, by means of a harmonistic exegesis, which sought to gather up every prophetic image in one grand panorama of the issues of Israel's and the world's history.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 54.

harmonium (här-mō'ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀρμόνιον, neut. of ἀρμόνιος, harmonious, < ἀρμόνία, harmony: see harmony.] One of the forms of the reed-organ (which see). The essential difference between the harmonium and the so-called American organ lies in the fact that in the former the air is compressed by the bellows and thence driven out through the reeds, while in the latter the bellows produce a vacuum into which the outside air is drawn through the reeds. Harmonium is the usual term in England and France for all reed-organs.

harmonization (här'mō-ni-zā'shən), n. [Gr. harmonize + -ation.] The act of harmonizing, or the state of being harmonized. Also spelled harmonisation.

The life of the social organism must, as an end, rank above the lives of its units. These two ends are not harmonious at the outset; and though the tendency is towards harmonization of them, they are still partially conflicting.
H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, p. 134.

harmonize (här'mō-niz), v.; pret. and pp. harmonized, ppr. harmonizing. [= F. harmoniser = Sp. armozar = Pg. harmonizar = It. armonizzare; as harmony + -ize.] I. intrans. To be in harmony. (a) In music, to form a concord; agree in sounds or musical effect. (b) To agree in action, adaptation, or effect.

Magnificent versification and ingenious combinations rarely harmonize with the expression of deep feeling.
Macaulay, Dryden.

At Sebenico we see side by side a bit in one style and a bit in the other [Gothic and Renaissance], and yet the two contrive to harmonize.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 94.

(c) To agree in sense or purport. (d) To agree in sentiment or feeling; be at peace one with another. =Syn. To agree, accord, correspond, tally, square, chime, comport.

II. trans. 1. To make harmonious; adjust in fit proportions; cause to agree; show the harmony or agreement of; reconcile contradictions between.

Various attempts to harmonize the views of the parties proved abortive.

Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, App. ii, p. 429.

2. To make musically harmonious; combine according to the laws of counterpoint; also, to set accompanying parts to, as an air or melody: as, a harmonized song.

A music harmonizing our wild cries.
Tennyson, Sea Dreams.

Also spelled harmonise.

harmonizer (här'mō-ni-zēr), n. One who harmonizes; a harmonist. Also spelled harmoniser.

harmonometer (här-mō-nom'e-tēr), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἀρμόνια, harmony, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument or monochord for measuring the harmonic relations of sounds. It often consists of a single string stretched over movable bridges.

harmony (här'mō-ni), n.; pl. harmonies (-niz). [ME. harmonie, armony, < OF. harmonie, F. harmonie = Pr. armonia = Sp. armonia = Pg. harmonia = It. armonia = D. harmonie = G. harmonie = Sw. Dan. harmoni, < L. harmonia, < Gr. ἀρμόνια, a concord of sounds, music, a system of music, esp. the octave-system; personified, Harmonia, Music, companion of Hebe (Youth), the Graces and the Hours, daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, and wife of Cadmus (see harmonia); a particular use of ἀρμόνια, a joining, joint, proportion, order, rule, pattern, cf. ἀρμός, a fitting, joining, ἀρμόσιον, fit together, join, set in order, < ἀρμω*, fut. ἀρμω, join: see arm, arm, article, etc.] 1. A combination of tones that is pleasing to the ear; concord of sounds or tones.

He [the angler] hereth the melodious armony of fowles.
Juliana Berners, Treatise of Fysshynge, fol. 2.

Grit pitie was to heir and se
The noys and dulesum harmonie.
Battle of Harlaw (Child's Ballads, VII. 182).

O mighty-mouth'd inventor of harmonies. . .
God-gifted organ-voice of England.
Tennyson, Milton.

2. Especially, in music: (a) Music in general, regarded as an agreeable combination of tones. (b) Any simultaneous combination of consonant or related tones; a concord. (c) Specifically, a common chord or triad. See triad. It is tonic when based directly on the tonic or key-note, dominant when based on the dominant or fifth tone of the key. (d) The entire chordal structure of a piece, as distinguished from its melody or its rhythm. Harmony is two-part, three-part, four-part, etc., according to the number of the voice-parts employed. It is strict or false, according to its observance of established rules of chord-formation and voice-progression. It is simple when not more than one of the essential tones of the chords is doubled, compound when two or more of those tones are doubled; compound harmony requires more than four voice-parts. It is close when the voice-parts lie as close together as the structure of the chords will allow; dispersed, extended, open, or spread, when they are so separated that by transposition of an octave any one would fall between two others. It is plain when only essential tones are used and when derived chords are but sparingly introduced; figured, when suspensions, anticipations, passing-notes, etc., are used for melodic and rhythmic variety, or when foreign tones are frequently introduced. It is diatonic when only the tones of a given key are used, chromatic when other tones also appear. It is pure when performed in pure intonation, tempered when performed in tempered intonation. (e) The science of the structure, relations, and practical combination of chords: the fundamental branch of the science of musical composition. It regards composition rather vertically than horizontally, noting especially the chords involved, and studying the voice-parts only so far as their nature or relations affect the value and interrelation of the successive chords. It treats of the following topics: intervals, consonant or dissonant, typical or derived, perfect, major, minor, diminished, or augmented; chords, both triads and seventh-chords, typical and derived (with their inversions), major, minor, diminished, and augmented, with their esthetic value both independently and comparatively; voice-progression, from chord to chord, direct, oblique or opposite, pure or false, including the preparation and resolution of discords; suspensions, anticipations, passing-notes, and all other melodic interferences with regular chords, including figuration; tonality or keyship, with special regard to the relations of the tonic and dominant chords, to the use of derived chords, and to the formation of cadences; modulation, or the alteration of tonality by the use of tones foreign to the original key, with the classification of key-relationships; thorough-bass, the science of indicating harmonic facts by figures and signs appended to the notes of a given bass. Harmony is now technically distinguished from counterpoint, and regarded as the more elementary branch of composition; but historically counterpoint preceded it by some centuries. Harmony in the modern sense did not become possible until between 1550 and 1600, when the esthetic value of chords as such was recognized for the first time in scientific music. Its development since that time has been steady and radically important to musical history. Its rules have been modified more or less so as to admit to usage, under certain conditions, many chord-formations and voice-progressions at first regarded as entirely impermissible. The growth of instrumental music, especially of that for the organs and pianoforte, has considerably influenced the conception of harmonic canons, leading them away from the simplicity originally derived from a purely vocal standard. Acoustical researches have also, from time to time, led to rearrangements of harmonic material. The great body of harmonic principles is now substantially accepted by all theorists, in nearly identical form, as the only sound basis for a thorough science of composition or a just method of criticism. Numerous efforts have been made by the founders of musical theories to discover more comprehensive principles of composition, from which the ordinary rules of harmony may be deduced, but with as yet but uncertain practical result.

3. Any arrangement or combination of related parts or elements that is consistent or is esthetically pleasing; agreement of particulars according to some standard of consistency or of the esthetic judgment; an accordant, agreeable, or suitable conjunction or assemblage of details; concord; congruity. Harmony is to be distinguished from symmetry: thus, in a symmetrical building, two opposite wings are exactly identical, though usually with the architectural members in inverse order, while in a harmonious building the two wings need not be identical in a single detail, if they balance each other so as to form, taken together, a pleasing and consistent whole.

All men in shape I did so far excel
(The parts in me such harmony did bear),
As in my model Nature seem'd to tell
That her perfection she had placed here.
Drayton, Pierce Gaveston.

The qualities of the active and the contemplative statesman appear to have been blended in the mind of the writer into a rare and exquisite harmony.
Macaulay, Machiavelli.

What we call the progress of knowledge is the bringing of Thoughts into harmony with Things; and it implies that the first Thoughts are either wholly out of harmony with Things, or in very incomplete harmony with them.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 110.

4. Accord, as in action or feeling; agreement, as in sentiment or interests; concurrence; good understanding; peace and friendship.

Harmony to behold in wedded pair
More grateful than harmonious sound to the ear.
Milton, P. L., viii. 605.

Thus harmony and family accord
Were driven from Paradise.
Couper, Task, vi. 379.

No States cherished greater harmony, both of principle and feeling, than Massachusetts and South Carolina.
D. Webster, Reply to Hayne.

5. A collation of parallel passages from different works treating of the same subject, for the purpose of showing their agreement and of explaining their apparent discrepancies. Specifically—(a) A consecutive account of all the facts of the life and ministry of Jesus Christ, produced in the language of the gospel narratives, so brought together as to present as nearly as possible the true chronological order, with the different accounts of the same transactions placed side by side to supplement one another. (b) A table in which references to the different gospel narratives are printed in parallel columns.

6. In anat., same as harmonia, 1.—Constabished harmony. See constabish.—Essential harmony, in music: (a) The harmony of a composition when reduced to its simplest form by the omission of all decorative matter. (b) The tonic, dominant, and subdominant triads of a major key.—Harmony or music of the spheres, according to the fancy of Pythagoras and his school, a music, imperceptible to human ears, produced by the movements of the heavenly bodies. Pythagoras supposed these motions to conform to certain fixed laws which could be expressed in numbers, corresponding to the numbers which give the harmony of sounds. The seven planets produced severally the seven notes of the gamut.

And after shewed he hym the nyne speris [spheres];
And after that the melody herde he,
That cometh of thilke speris thryes thre,
That welles is of musik and melody
In this world here, and cause of armonye.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 63.

Look how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold.
There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins:
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.
Shak., M. of V., v. 1.

Harmony Society. See Harmonist, 4.—Preestablished harmony, the doctrine of Leibnitz by which he explained the relation between mind and matter, as distinct substances, and the facts of our knowledge of the material world. He supposed the universe to consist of monads, or self-contained beings, which cannot act one upon another, each state of every monad being determined solely by its preceding states; but at the same time he assumed that each monad is a mirror of the universe. To explain the fact that the succession of states of any one monad, as a human mind, actually corresponds to the succession of states in other monads, and that thus the mental picture of the events of the external world is a true one, he assumed that a certain harmony (the preestablished harmony) was established in the beginning by God among the monads. = Syn. 2. Melody, Rhythm, etc. See euphony.—4. Correspondence, consistency, congruity; amity.

harmost (här'most'), n. [Gr. ἀρμοστής, governor, < ἀρμόζειν, set in order, regulate; see harmony.] In Gr. antiq., the title of the governors supplied by the Lacedaemonians, during their supremacy after the Peloponnesian war, over subject or conquered towns; hence, in general, a military governor of a colony or province.

When Sparta conquered another Greek city, she sent a harmost to govern it like a tyrant; in other words, she virtually enslaved the subject city.

J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 75.

harmotome (här'mō-tōm), n. [Gr. ἀρμότης, a joint, + τέμνειν, temneiv, cut.] A mineral belonging to the zeolite group, commonly occurring in cruciform twin crystals which vary in color from white to yellow, red, or brown. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminium and barium. Sometimes called cross-stone and androlopite.

The W. harnais, harness, trappings, is from E.] 1. The defensive armor and weapons of a soldier, especially of a knight; in general, and especially in modern poetical use, a suit of armor. The trappings of the war-horse are also sometimes included in the term. Harness was the early name for body-armor of all kinds. Modern writers have tried to discriminate between harness as the armor of the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, and armor as confined to the plate suits of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but armor is the modern English word for defensive garments of all sorts, and harness in this sense is a poetical archaism.

When thei were alle come to the londe thei were right gladd, and trussed their harnays, and lepe on their horse.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 259.

I can remember that I buckled his harnes when he went to Blackheath felds. Latimer, 1st Sermon bef. Edw. VI.

Ring the alarm-bell.—Blow wind! come wrack!
At least we'll die with harnes on our back.

Shak., Macbeth, v. 5.

They quitted not their harnes bright,
Neither by day, nor yet by night.

Scott, L. of L. M., i. 4.

2. Clothing; dress; garments. [Rare.]—3. The working-gear or tackle of a horse, mule, ass, goat, dog, or other animal (except the ox) used for draft; the straps, collar, bridle, lines, traces, etc., put upon a draft-animal to enable it to work and to guide its actions. See cut in next column.

Another of these disguised peasants cuts the hairness of the horse.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 21.

Hence—4. Figuratively, working-tackle of any kind; an equipment for any kind of labor; also, that which fits or makes ready for labor; as, his duties keep him constantly in the harness.

[It the soul] arouses itself at last from these endearments, as toys, and puts on the harness, and aspires to vast and universal aims.
Emerson, Love.

Seven pedals are used, one for each tone of the scale, all of which may be held by notches in either position, so that the entire instrument may be tuned diatonically in the scale of C₇, beginning two octaves below middle C, and extending upward about six and a half octaves. The pedal-action is so contrived that a slight movement raises the pitch of all the strings of the same letter-name a semitone; while a greater movement shortens them two semitones. 3. To sift or separate by means of a harp or screen: as, to harp grain; to harp sand. See harp, n., 4 and 5. [Scotch.]

Harpa (harp), n. [NL., < LL. harpa, a harp; see harp.] A genus of mollusks, representative of the family Harpidæ, having a comparatively wide aperture and ventricose cross-ribbed whorls; the harp-shells. There are several species, of most tropical seas. Lamarck, Jour. Soc. Hist. Nat., 1799. See cut under harp-shell.

harpa², n. See harpe.

Harpactor (harp-pak'tor), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρπακτωρ, var. of ἁρπακτής, a robber, < ἁρπάζειν, snatch, seize, steal.] A genus of predatory heteropterous insects, of the family Reduviidæ. The head is convex behind the eyes, the ocelli are distant and knobbed, and the first antennal joint is as long as and stouter than the two following. Harpactor cinctus, about 10 millimeters long, and easily recognized by its yellowish-brown color and banded legs, is abundant in the eastern parts of North America.

Harpactorides (harp-pak-tor'i-déz), n. pl. [NL., < Harpactor + -ides.] A group of heteropterous insects, named from the genus Harpactor.

Harpagidæ (harp-paj'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Harpax (Harpag), 2, + -idæ.] A family of orthopterous insects regarded by Burmeister as a subfamily of Mantidæ, having two projections on the vertex and spurs on the four hinder tibiae. It includes several genera besides Harpax, the typical genus.

Harpagifer (harp-paj'i-fer), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρπάγιον, a hook, + L. ferre = E. bear¹.] The typical genus of Harpagiferidæ; so called from the hook-like spine which arises from the operculum. J. Richardson, 1848.

Harpagiferidæ (harp-paj'i-fer'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Harpagifer + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Harpagifer. The body is naked, the snout rounded, the dorsal fins are two in number (the first short and the second oblong), and the anal fin is shorter than the second dorsal. Only two species, inhabitants of the antarctic seas, are known.

Harpago (harp'pa-gō), n. [NL., < L. harpago (n-), a hook, grapple; see harpagon.] 1. A genus of mollusks. Klein, 1753.—2. [l. c.; pl. harpagones (harp-pa-gō'péz).] In Entom., one of the clasps of the genital armature of a lepidopterous insect.

harpagot, n. [L. harpago (n-), < Gr. ἁρπάγη, a hook, a rake, < ἁρπάζειν, snatch, seize; see harpoon, harpy.] A grappling-iron.

At last the enemies from out the Carthaginian ships began to cast out certain loggets, with iron hooks at the end (which the soldiers call harpagones). . . for to take hold upon the Roman ships. Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 746.

harpagones, n. Plural of harpago, 2.

Harpagophytum (harp-pa-gof'i-tum), n. [L. ἁρπάγη, a hook (see harpago), + φυτόν, a plant.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants founded by Meisner in 1836, belonging to the natural order Pedaliaceæ, distinguished botanically from Pedaliaceæ and other related genera by having numerous ovules instead of only two in each cell. It embraces five species, natives of South Africa and Madagascar. It derives its name from its peculiar fruit, which is armed with long and strong hooked spines, adhering firmly to the mouth or nose of animals which touch them while grazing, a circumstance from which the principal species, H. procumbens, has acquired the name of grapple-plant. The plants are perennials of herbaceous aspect, with incised leaves, and solitary short-pedicelled flowers in their axils.

Harpagornis (harp-pa-gōr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρπάξ (ar-pax), robbing, rapacious (see Harpax), + ὄρνις, a bird.] 1. A genus of subfossil rapacious birds of New Zealand, of size and strength sufficiently great to enable them to prey upon the moas. Julius Haast, 1872.—2. [l. c.] A bird of this genus.

Harpagus (harp'pa-gus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρπάγη, a hook; see harpago.] 1. A notable genus of South American falcons with bidentate or doubly toothed beak, such as H. bidentatus or H. diodon. Also called Bidens (Spix, 1824), Diodon (Lesson, 1831), and Diplodon (Nitzsch, 1840). N. A. Vigors, 1824.—2. A genus of tineid moths. Stephens, 1834.

Harpalidæ (harp-pal'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Harpalus + -idæ.] The Harpalinae rated as a separate family. The same or a similar group is also called Harpalida, Harpalidea, Harpalides, and Harpalini.

Harpalinæ (harp-pa-li'ne), n. pl. [NL., < Harpalus + -inæ.] A subfamily of beetles, of the family Carabidæ, typified by the genus Harpalus. It includes adephagous beetles with the middle coxal cavities closed by the sterna, the epimera not reaching the coxae, no antennal grooves on the head, the supra-orbital setae distinct, and the ambulatorial abdominal setae usually well developed. They are generally found under stones.

harpaline (harp'pa-lin), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Harpalinae or Harpalidæ.

Harpalus (harp'pa-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρπαλος, greedy, < ἁρπάζειν, snatch, seize.] The typical genus of Harpalinae, containing many large flattened black beetles, as H. caliginosus (Say), a species about an inch long, found in the United States. Latreille, 1802.

Harpax (harp'paks), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρπάξ, rapacious, < ἁρπάζειν, snatch, seize; see harpagon, harpoon, harpy.] 1. A genus of fossil shells, of the group Ostracea, oblong and somewhat triangular in shape, the hinge being formed by two projecting teeth. It is now included in the genus Plicatula. Parkinson, 1811.—2. The typical genus of Harpagidæ. Serville, 1831.

harpe, harpa² (harp'pé, -pā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρπη, a sickle, simitar, hook.] 1. In classical myth., the peculiarly shaped sword of Hermes, lent by him to Perseus, who with it cut off the head of Medusa. It is represented sometimes as curved like a sickle, and sometimes with a straight blade from which projects a curved point or tooth.

2. In Entom., the inwardly projecting armature of the interior of the valves of the genital organs of lepidopterous insects. Gosse.—3. [cap.] In ichth., a genus of fishes. T. N. Gill, 1863.

Harpephyllum (harp-pé-fil'um), n. [NL. (Bernhardi, 1844), < Gr. ἁρπη, a simitar, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of South African evergreen trees, belonging to the natural order Anacardiaceæ and tribe Spondiææ, distinguished from related genera by its dioecious flowers (the male flowers having 8 or 9 stamens), and by its obovate, two-celled drupe. It has alternate odd-pinnate leaves crowded at the ends of the branches; the leaflets are falcate or sword-shaped. Only one species, H. Caffrum, is known, which is called Kajir's simitar-tree by the English and Eschenhout by the Dutch colonists. The fruit, which is edible, is called zuurbeesjes.

harper (harp'pér), n. [ME. harpere, herper, harpor, < AS. hearpere (= MHG. harpsere, G. harfner), a harper, < hearpian, harp; see harp, v.] 1. One who plays on the harp.

Mury is the twynkyng of the harpoure.

2. One of various Irish coins (for example, the 'shilling' and the 'groat') current in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: popularly so called from the harp which formed their reverse type. Also harp.

A mill sixence of my mother's . . . and a twopenny I had to spend, . . . besides the harper that was gathered amongst us to pay the piper.
B. Jonson, Gipsies Meta- [morphosed.]

3. The harp-seal.

harperess (harp'péres), n. [Also harpress; < harper + -ess.] A female player on the harp.

The rustling leaves of an aspen . . . overhanging the seat of the fair harperess.

Scott, Waverley, xxii.

harpers-cord, n. See harpischord.

Harpia (harp'pi-ē), n. Same as Harpyia.

Harpidæ (harp'pi-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Harpax + -idæ.] A family of rhachiglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Harpa. They have the head exposed, conspicuous eyes, a wide foot, and no operculum. The shell is ventricose, with a low spire, and longitudinal ribs cross the whorls. Nine species are known, inhabitants of the tropical seas.

harping (harp'ping), n. [ME. harping; verbal n. of harp, v.] 1. The act of playing on the harp; notes or strains performed on the harp.

Come into my hall, thou silly blind Harper,
And of thy harping let me hear!

Lochmaben Harper (Child's Ballads, VI. 8).

2. Naut.: (a) The fore parts of the wales, which encompass the bow and are fastened to the stem. harpist (här'pist), n. [= F. harpiste = Pg. harpista, arista = Sp. It. arpista; as harp + -ist. The proper E. word is harper.] One who plays on the harp; a harper.

That Ægrian harpist, for whose lay

Tigers with hunger pangs and left their pray.

W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, I. 5.

harp-lute (härp'lüt), n. A variety of guitar invented early in the nineteenth century, in which, by pressing a dital or thumb-key, the pitch of the strings may be chromatically raised. See dital harp, under dital.

harpoon (här-pön'), n. [= G. harpune = Dan. Sw. harpun, < D. harpoen (pron. as E. harpoon), < F. harpon, orig. a cramp-iron, hence a grappling-iron, a harpoon, = Sp. arpon = Pg. arpão, a harpoon; connected with OF. harpe, a dog's claw or paw, harper, grapple, grasp, Sp. Pg. appar, tear to pieces, rend, claw; these perhaps being shortened forms from the root of L. harpago (n.), a grappling-iron, hook, drag (> It. arpagone, a harpoon; see harpagon), < Gr. ἀρπάγ, a hook, a rake, < ἀρπάειν, snatch, seize, the shorter base appearing in ἀρπα, a bird of prey; see harpy.] A missile weapon used in capturing whales and large fish, and either thrown by hand or fired from a gun. See harpoon-gun. In the older form of this weapon the head is a heavy, flat, triangular piece of iron with strong barbs, sharpened on the outer edges to enable it to penetrate deeply, and fastened to a handle or shank, 2½ or 3 feet long, to which is attached a long cord or rope. In a later form the head has but one barb. The common non-explosive harpoon is not employed by whalemen to kill the whale, but merely to fasten it to the boat, in order that the latter may be hauled up alongside the animal, which is then killed by a lance. (See exploding harpoon, below.) The harpoons that are to be first used are carried at the head of the whale-boat, six being included in the outfit of a boat. The first two are known as the first and second irons; the rest as the spare harpoons, one of which is the drag-iron. The first harpoon is darted into the whale by hand, and the second follows if there is time; if not, it is thrown overboard to prevent fouling with the outgoing line. See toggie-iron.

The line is joined to the harpoon by the "foregoer," a piece of rope somewhat lighter and more pliable than whale-line. The foregoer being the only part of the line drawn out by the harpoon while in flight, its length, usually from 10 to 12 fathoms, regulates the distance the harpoon may be fired. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 526.

Bomb-harpoon, an explosive harpoon that may be thrust by hand or discharged from a swivel-gun; also, a bomb-lance. — Cone-harpoon, a barbed spear with fixed head and single point, used in the capture of large fish. (Bahamas, and Florida, U. S.) — Electric harpoon, a bomb-lance in which the charge is fired by means of an electric fuse, the connection being made by means of a wire in the harpoon-line. See bomb-lance. — Exploding or explosive harpoon, a harpoon the head of which is filled with an explosive; also, improperly, a bomb-lance. — Toggie-harpoon, the ordinary toggie-iron.

harpoon (här-pön'), v. t. [< harpoon, n.] To strike, catch, or kill with a harpoon.

The beluga is usually caught in nets, but is sometimes harpooned. Pennant.

harpoon-arrow (här-pön'ar'ō), n. An arrow propelled by a spring consisting of a bent rod or bow, used in fishing by the Eskimos of Alaska.

harpooneer, n. [Also harpoonnier, harponier; < harpoon + -eer.] Same as harpooner.

When they espy him [the whale] on the top of the water, . . . they row toward him in a Shallop, in which the Harpooner stands ready with both his hands to dart his Harping-iron. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 742.

harpooner (här-pō'nér), n. [< harpoon + -er.] One who throws a harpoon.

Each sail is set to catch the favouring gale,

While on the yard-arm the harpooner sits.

Gruening, The Sugar Cane, ii.

harpoon-fork (här-pön'fôrk), n. A hay-fork consisting of two barbed points like harpoons, forming a tool shaped like an inverted U.

harpoon-gun (här-pön'gun), n. A gun from which a harpoon or toggie-iron may be discharged. It may be either a gun fired from the shoulder or a swivel-gun. The projectile may be an explosive harpoon or lance (see bomb-lance), or simply a toggie-iron, without the pole, having an eye in the after end of the shank into which is bent one end of the tow-line, the latter being either on the outside of the barrel of the gun or doubled up in the bore.

harpoon-shuttle (här-pön'shut'), n. A long shuttle or needle used in weaving large brush mats which are employed in building dikes and levees, and in other hydraulic constructions.

Harporhynchus (här-pō-ring'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀρπη, a sickle, & ῥυγχος, bill.] A notable genus of mocking-thrushes, of the subfamily Mimidae; the bow-billed mockers, or thrashers: so called from the arcuation of the bill. The common thrasher or brown thrush of the United States is H. rufus; there are numerous other species in the southwestern United States and Mexico, as the Californian thrasher (H. redivivus), the Yuma thrasher (H. lecontei), etc. This name was given by Cabanis in 1848; the genus had before been called Harpes and Troxostoma, names both preoccupied in other connections; the name Methriopterus was given to the genus by Reichenbach in 1850.

harp-pedal (härp'ped'al), n. One of the foot-levers by which the strings of a harp are temporarily shortened and their pitch raised. See harp, 1. Also called harp-treadle.

harp-seal (härp'sel), n. The Greenland seal, Phoca granlandica or Pagophilus granlandicus, a large hair-seal of a whitish color with a crescentic black band on each side meeting its fellow over the back, forming a figure likened to a harp. It is common from Newfoundland northward, and is of gregarious and roving habits, congregating in vast numbers on ice-floes, where many thousands are annually killed. The Newfoundland sealers call them harpers or harpas; the female is known as Jennie harp; the young in the second year, hopper-harp or bedlamer; in the third year, when assuming adult characters, turner-harp.

harpsecolt, n. See harpiscolt.

harp-shell (härp'shel), n. A shell of the genus Harpa. Species such as the East Indian H. ventricosa are very common in collections.

The shell is large and inflated, yet not capacious enough to hold the whole animal.

harp-shilling (härp'shil'ing), n. See harper, 2.

harp-sichont, n. See harp-sichol.

harp-sichord (härp'si-kôrd), n. [Formerly also arp-sichord; a corrupt form, otherwise perverted harp-sichon, harp-sicon, harp-sicol, harp-secol, and even harpers-cord (the letter s being intrusive); < OF. harpe-chorde (= It. arpicordo), < harpe, harp, + chorde, corde, chord, cord.] A stringed musical instrument in use in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, which in its form and in the arrangement of the keyboard and strings resembled a piano, but in which the tone was produced by the plucking or snapping of the strings by leather or quill points, which were set in jacks connected by levers with the keys. In form it usually resembled a modern grand pianoforte, though both square and upright varieties were also made. The length of the keyboard was from four to six and a half octaves. The number of separate strings to a key varied from one to four, sometimes including one tuned an octave above the others; the latter variety was called a double harpsichord. The tone was weak and thickling, and gradation of force was impossible. Two keyboards were sometimes combined, one for soft effects, the other for loud. Numerous devices, usually connected with the jacks, were introduced at different times to secure variety in force, and especially in quality. These mechanisms, which often aimed to simulate the tonalities of various orchestral instruments, were usually controlled by stop-knobs near the keyboard. The harpsichord, though essentially different from the pianoforte, was its immediate predecessor. Before 1800 it was regularly used in all dramatic music, especially in accompanying recitatives, and in orchestral music. The conductor usually directed from his seat at a harpsichord placed amid the other instruments.

harpula (härp'pū-lā), n. A valuable tree, Harpulia cyparioides; so called at Chittagong in Bengal. See Harpullia.

Harpulia (härp'pū-lī-ā), n. [< harpula.] Same as Harpullia.

Harpullia (härp-pul'i-ā), n. [NL. (Roxburgh, 1820), < harpula.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous trees, belonging to the natural order Sapindaceæ and type of the tribe Harpullieæ of Radlkofe, distinguished from related genera by its two-valved capsule with loculicidal dehiscence. It embraces 6 species, natives of tropical Asia, Australia, and Madagascar. They are erect trees with alternate, odd-pinnate leaves, green flowers in racemes or panicles, and large red or orange-colored fruit. The Australian species have an economic importance, either as hardy evergreen shade-trees or for the quality of their wood. H. Hüllii attains a height of 80 feet, and furnishes the tulipwood of Queensland, which is valuable for fine cabinet-work. The Moreton bay tulip wood, H. pendula, is equally valuable. H. cyparioides, the harpula of India, has long been in cultivation.

Harpullieæ (här-pu-lī'ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Harpullia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Sapindaceæ, suborder Sapindææ, recently established by Radlkofe, embracing the genera Harpullia, Conchopetalum, Magonia, Xanthoceras, and Ugnadia. See Harpullia.

harpy (här'pi, n.; pl. harpies (-piz). [Early mod. E. harpie, < OF. harpie, harpye, < L. harpyia, usually in pl. harpyia, < Gr. ἁρπυῖα, pl. the harpies, lit. 'the snatchers,' in Homer a personification of whirlwinds or hurricanes, in later myth. hideous winged creatures (see def. 1); cf. ἁρπυγία, a certain bird of prey; < ἁρπύξ-ev, snatch, seize, = L. rapere, snatch, seize: see *rap*², rap-ture.] 1. In Gr. myth., a winged monster, ravenous and filthy, having the face and body of a woman and the wings of a bird of prey, with the feet and fingers armed with sharp claws and the face pale with hunger, serving as a minister of divine vengeance, and defiling everything it touched. The harpies were commonly regarded either as two (Aello and Ocypete) or three in number, but occasionally several others are mentioned. They were originally conceived of simply as storm-winds sent by the gods to carry off offenders, and were later personified as fair-haired winged maidens, their features and characteristics being more or less repulsive at different times and places. The harpies

Also Harpia, Harpyia.
harquebus, arquebus (här'-, är'ke-bus), n. [Also harquebuss, harquebuse, arquebuse, harquebuz, harcubuse, archibuze (after It.), harquebush, hargubush, etc., in many unstable forms; < F. harquebuse, arquebuse, dial. harkibuse, after It. arcubugio, arcubuso, now archibugio, archibuso = Sp. Pg. arcabuz, corrupt forms of a form nearer the orig., namely, OF. hacquebuche, hacquebute, etc., represented by E. hackbut: see hack-but. The word, in all forms, became obsolete with the thing; but the form harquebus, with many minor variations of spelling, is the one now commonly used by archaeologists and historians.] 1. An old form of hand-firearm. The earliest hand-guns having been mere tubes fired by a burning match applied to the touch-hole, the name harquebus was given to a gun fitted with a match-holder which came down upon the priming-pan when a trigger was pulled. Later, when the wheel-lock was introduced, a piece fitted with it was still called a harquebus. After the musket had been introduced into the French army (about 1575), the harquebus remained the favorite weapon of private persons, because it was lighter and was supposed to have greater precision. It was not a heavy arm, and was rarely fired from a rest, except by horsemen, who had a light rest secured to the saddle-bow. But during the sixteenth century many experiments were made with firearms throwing balls of six or even four to the pound, mounted on swivels, for rampart-defense, and these, when fitted with a match-lock, were called great harquebuses; in like manner arquebuse à croc, or 'with a rest', was a name given to a heavy but still portable weapon, which was superseded by the musket.

They [the Janizaries] serve with harquebuses, armed besides with cymeters and hatchets.

Sandys, Travailes, p. 38.

A chance-medley combat ensued, with lances, arquebuses, cross-bows, and scimitars. Irving, Granada, p. 452.

Such fine results had been obtained by the English long-bow men that, although in the time of Henry VIII, the arquebus had been brought to a far more perfect state than when first introduced, it was forbidden by Act of Parliament to be used, or even to be possessed, by any of the king's subjects.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 11.

2. A harquebusier.

He marcheth in the middle, guarded about
With full five hundred harquebuses on foot.
Peele, Battle of Alcazar, iv. 1.

Double harquebus, a harquebus with two locks, either both of the same mechanism and merely as a precaution against the inferior workmanship of the day, or one a match-lock and the other a flint- or wheel-lock.

The soldiers discharged a salvo of harquebusades on the poor people.

Roger Williams, Brief Discourse of War (1590).

2. A distilled aromatic spirituous liquor applied to sprains or bruises.

You will find a letter from my sister to thank you for the arquebusade water which you sent her. Chesterfield.

harquebusiert, arquebusiert (här'-, är'ke-bus-ēr'), n. [Also harquebussier, arquebuser, harcu- busier, etc.; < F. arquebusier (ML. arcubusarius), < arquebuse, harquebuse, harquebus: see harquebus. Cf. hackbut.] A soldier armed with a harquebus.

He giueth to his Harcubusiers certaine allowance for powder and shot. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 239.

Well fare an old harquebusier yet,
Could prime his powder, and give fire, and hit,
All in a twinkling! B. Jonson, Alchemist, v. 3.

The Spanish arquebusiers, screened by their defences, poured a galling fire into the dense masses of the enemy. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 12.

In mimic pride the small-wrought tissue shines,
Perchance of tabby or of harrateen.
Not ill expressive. Shenstone, Economy, iii.

You never saw such a wretched hovel, lean, unpainted, and half its nakedness barely shaded with harrateen stretched till it cracks. Walpole, Letters, ii. 4.

harridan (här'i-dan), n. [Origin uncertain; supposed by Skeat to be a variant of OF. aridelle, haridelle, a worn-out horse, a lean, ill-favored jade, F. a jade, a thin scraggy woman (cf. *jade*¹, similarly used); appar. dim. < aride, dry, withered: see arid.] An odious old woman; a hag; a vixenish woman.

I have a scheme to see you shortly with the old harridan's consent, and even to make her a go-between in our interview. Sheridan, The Rivals, iii. 3.

Such a weak, watery, wicked old harridan substituted for the pretty creature I had been used to see. De Quincey, Secret Societies, i.

harrier¹ (här'i-ēr), n. [< *hare*¹ + *-ier*¹.] A small kind of hound employed in hunting the hare. There are particular breeds of the harrier, as the large slow-hunting harrier and the little fox-beagle, and a cross-breed between these. In all the scent is extremely keen, which enables them to follow all the doublings of the hare. Also spelled harier.

harrier² (här'i-ēr), n. [< harry + *-er*¹. Cf. *harrover*².] 1. One who harries. See harry, v.

She [Grandeur] hides her mountains and her sea
From the harriers of scenery
Who hunt down sunsets, and huddle and bay,
Mouthing and mumbling the dying day.
Lovell, Appledore.

2. A bird of prey of the family Falconidae, subfamily Circinæ, and genus Circus. There are about 12 species, of most parts of the world, of light build, small-bodied in proportion to the length of wing and tail, with a rather long and slender scaly shank, untoothed bill, large external ear-parts, and a ruff or disk somewhat like an owl's. The best-known species is the European hen-harrier or ringtail, Circus cyaneus, from which the common marsh-hawk of America, C. hudsonius, scarcely differs. (See cut under Circinæ.) The European marsh-harrier is C. aeruginosus. (See harry, 3(b).) Montagu's harrier is another species, C. cinereus. The males of the harriers differ much from the females, being bluish above instead of dark-brown, and are often called blue-hawks.

It [a pheasant] was immediately pursued by the blue hawk, known by the name of the hen-harrier.

Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, Obs. on Birds.

harriment (här'i-mənt), n. [Sc. also harriment; < harry + -ment.] Harrying; vexation; trouble.

harshlet, n. See haslet.

harst (härst), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of harvest.

harstgite (härst'gi-tit), n. [< Harstig (see def.) + -ite.] A silicate of aluminum, manganese, calcium, and magnesium, occurring in yellow to brown orthorhombic crystals at the Harstig mine, Paysberg, Sweden.

harstrongt (här'ströng), n. [Also horestrang, horestrang (with same initial element as horehound, hoarhound); < D. harstrang, < G. harnstrenge, strangury; < harn, urine, + strang, a string (strangieren, strangle); see strangle.] Peucedanum officinale, a common umbelliferous plant of Europe, formerly used in medicine. See Peucedanum. An extract called peucedanin was obtained from the root, which has been found to be identical with imperatorin, extracted from the masterwort, Peucedanum Ostruthium, with the chemical formula $C_{12}H_{12}O_3$.

hart (härst), n. [< ME. hart, hert, heort, < AS. heart, heorot = D. hert = OHG. hiruz, hirt, MHG. hirs, G. hirs, now hirsch = Icel. hjörtr = Sw. Dan. hjört, a hart; with formative -t, = L. cervus = W. carw, a hart, stag; lit. 'horned,' = Gr. κεράς, horned, < κέρας (kepar), a horn, akin to E. horn; see horn.] 1. The male of the red deer, Cervus elaphus, the female of which is called hind; a stag, especially an adult stag or male red deer after its fifth year, when the sur-royal or crown-antler has appeared. The term belongs properly to the species named, but is extended to related kinds of deer. See antler, hind, stag.

The werwolf an huge hert hadde hunted.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 2569.

There are wild Bores & wild Harts in that Forrest [Veronne]. Coryat, Crudities, i. 13.

A creature that was current then
In these wild woods, the hart with golden horns.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

My blood leaped as nimbly and joyously as a young hart on the mountains of Bethor.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 52.

2. In her, a stag used as a bearing. It is taken as a stag in its sixth year or older, but the word stag is not used in blazon.—Hart of grease. See grease, 2.—Hart of ten; a hart with ten times or branches on his horns.

Scar. A great, large deer!

Rob. What head?

John. Forked: a hart of ten.

B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, i. 2.

Hart royal. "A hart that escapes after having been pursued by royalty was ever afterward termed a hart royal; and if the king or queen made proclamation for his safe return, he was then called a hart royal proclaimed." (Hartwell).—Hart's black. See black.

hart², n. An obsolete spelling of heart.
hartaal (här'täl), n. [Hind. hartaal.] Orpiment.
hartebeest, hartebeest (här'té'st), n. [South-African D. hartebeest, < harte, appar. a modification (after E. hart?) of D. hert (= E. hart), + beest = E. beast.] A large African antelope, Alcelaphus caama. Also called caama.

I have seen, at break of day, hartebeeste, wildebeeste, eland, and sassabi within easy rifle range of my position.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 618.

hartberry (här'tber'i), n.; pl. hartberries (-iz). [ME. not found; AS. heort, heorot, heorot-berge, berry of the buckthorn, < heort, heorot, hart, + berie, berge, berry.] The bilberry of Europe or blueberry of Scotland, Vaccinium Myrtillus. See bilberry. Also called hart-crop.

hart-clover, n. [ME. hertecloer, hertclover (glossing L. trifolium), < AS. heort-claëre, heort-claëre, glossing cynocephalon and camedris, < heort, heorot, hart, + claëre, clover.] A plant, Medicago maculata. Also heart-clover.

hart-crop (här't'krop), n. [ME. not found; AS. heorot-crop (once), a plant, appar. buckthorn, or perhaps hartwort, < heorot, hart, + crop, crop.] Same as hartberry.

hartel, n. An obsolete spelling of heart.

hartebeest, n. See hartebeest.

hartent, v. t. An obsolete spelling of hearten.

Hartford fern. Same as climbing-fern.

hartin (här'tin), n. [< (Ober)hart (see def.) + -in.] A fossil resin ($C_{10}H_{17}O$) resembling hartite, massive, but crystallizing from rock-oil in needles belonging to the trimetric system. It is found in the lignite of Oberhart, Austria.

hartite (här'tit), n. [< (Ober)hart (see def.) + -ite.] A fossil resin (C_9H_9) resembling hartin, and found like it in the lignite of Oberhart, Austria.

Hartleian (här'tlé-an), a. Pertaining or relating to David Hartley, M. D. (1705-57), an English metaphysician generally regarded as the founder of the associationist school. His "Observations on Man" was published in 1749.

Their mode of thinking (that of the Philosophic Radical) was . . . a combination of Bentham's point of view with . . . the Hartleian metaphysics.
J. S. Mill, Autobiog., p. 105.

Hartogia (här-tö'ji-ä), n. [NL, named after John Hartog, an early traveler.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Celastrineae, distinguished from related genera by having the stamens located between the lobes of the disk, and by its ovoid fruit and serrate leaves. It includes only a single species, H. Capensis, a South African shrub or low tree, the wood of which is remarkably hard, tough, fine-grained, and susceptible of polish. The Dutch colonists call it ladie-wood, from the chief use to which they put it. It is also used for veneering.

hartroyal (här'troi'al), n. 1. Same as hart royal (which see, under hart).—2. A plant, a species of plantain.

hart's-ball, (härts'bälz), n. Same as hart's-truffles.

hart's-clover (härts'klö'vër), n. [< Hart-clover.] A plant, Melilotus officinalis, the yellow melilot: so called, it is said, because deer delight to feed on it. Also called hart's-trefoil.

hart's-eye, n. Wild dittany. Topsell.

hartshorn (härts'hörn), n. [= D. hartshorn; as hart's, poss., + horn; cf. G. hirschhorn = Sw. hjorthorn = Dan. hjørtehorn.] 1. The antler of the hart or stag, Cervus elaphus. The constituent elements of deciduous antlers differ materially from those of persistent horns, as of the ox, and are identical, or nearly so, with those of bone. These antlers were formerly much used as a source of ammonia, and the products of their distillation were employed in medicine under the name of the volatile salt of hartshorn, or spirit of hartshorn; but they have now been superseded by simpler preparations of ammonia and ammonium carbonate, often called by the same name. See ammonia, 1.

Hartshorn has been usually imported into this country from Germany, in the form of shavings. These are without smell and taste, pliable, and of an ivory yellow color.
U. S. Dispensary, p. 1659.

2. Spirit of hartshorn; ammonia.—3. In bot. See hartshorn-plantain.—Jelly of hartshorn, a nutritive jelly formerly obtained from shavings of the horns of harts, now procured from shavings of the bones of calves.

hartshorn-plantain (härts'hörn-plan'tän), n. A species of plantain, Plantago Coronopus, common in Europe: so called from its furcated leaves. See buck's-horn.

hart's-thorn (härts'thörn), n. Same as buck-thorn, Rhamnus catharticus.

hart's-tongue (härts'tung), n. [< ME. hertes tunge, hertys tonge, hertes tounge; not found in AS.; = MHG. hirzes zunge, G. hirschzunge.] A fern, Scolopendrium vulgare, with long simple fronds; also, rarely, Polypodium Singaporeanum and Acrostichum cervinum. See Scolopendrium.

hart's-trefoil (härts'tré'foil), n. Same as hart's-clover.

hart's-truffles (härts'truf'lz), n. A fungus, Elaphomyces granulatus, supposed to be an aphrodisiac, now sold under the name of lycopodium nuts. Formerly also called hart's-balls and deer-balls.

hartwort (här'twört), n. One of several umbelliferous plants of the genera Tordylium, Seseli, and Bupleurum, especially Tordylium maximum, native of southern Europe and northern Africa, and sparingly found in England. See Tordylium.

harum-scarum (här'um-skär'um), a. and n. [Also formerly harem-scarem; a riming compound of uncertain elements, now appar. acrom, to hare, as a type of unreasoning haste and instability, and to scare, in allusion to its timidity. Cf. E. dial. havey-scarey, helter-skelter (in Cumberlând), also waverer, doubtful (Grose).] 1. a. Harebrained; flighty; giddy; rash.

He seemed a mighty rattling harem-scarem gentleman.
Mme. D'Arblay, Diary, I. 363.

She was one of the first who brought what I call harum-scarum manners into fashion.

Miss Edgeworth, Belinda, III.

Don't take these flights
Upon moon-shiny nights,
With gay harum-scarum young men.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 162.

They had a quarrel with Sir Thomas Newcome's own son, a harum-scarum lad, who ran away, and then was sent to India.
Thackeray, Newcomes, v.

II. a. Giddy, harebrained, or rash person.

When I married I was a girl like you, only ten times wilder, the greatest harum-scarum in the county!
Mrs. Craik, Agatha's Husband, xii.

haruspex (ha-rus'peks), n.; pl. haruspices (-pisez). [L., also written, less correctly, aruspex, lit. inspector of entrails, < haru* = Skt. hira, entrails (akin to χολάδες, entrails, χορδή, gut (> ult. E. cord, chord, q. v.), and to E. yarn, q. v.), + specere, view, inspect; see species, spectacle, etc. Cf. L. harvulus, a soothsayer, a word containing the same element haru-: see hariolator.] One of a class of minor priests or soothsayers in ancient Rome, of Etrurian origin, whose function it was to inspect the entrails of victims killed in sacrifice, and by them, as well as by certain natural phenomena, to interpret the will of the gods. Their duties were thus similar to those of the augurs, who, however, occupied a much higher position in the state.

A little after the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, the haruspices ordered the temples of the deities to be demolished.
Jortin, On Eccles. Hist.

"Am I to be frightened," he said, in answer to some report of the haruspices, "because a sheep is without a heart?"
Frontin, Caesar, p. 510.

haruspication (ha-rus-pi-kä'shon), n. [< haruspex (-spic-) + -ation.] The act or practice of prognosticating by the inspection of the entrails of animals slain in sacrifice; divination.

Haruspication belongs, among the lower races, especially to the Malays and Polynesians, and to various Asiatic tribes. . . . Captain Burton's account from Central Africa perhaps fairly displays its symbolic principle. He describes the mganga or sorcerer taking an ordeal by killing and splitting a fowl and inspecting its inside; if blackness or bluishness appears about the wings, it denotes the treachery of children and kinsmen; the backbone convicts the mother and grandmother; the tail shows that the criminal is the wife, etc.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 111.

haruspice (ha-rus'pis), n. [< L. haruspex, pl. haruspices; see haruspex.] Same as haruspex.

haruspices, n. Plural of haruspex.

haruspicy (ha-rus'pi-si), n. [< L. haruspicium, the inspection of victims, < haruspex, haruspex; see haruspex.] Same as haruspication.

Also aruspicy. See haruspex.

harvest (här'vest), n. [E. dial. and Sc. contr. harrest, harst, hairst, < ME. harvest, hervest, herfest, harvest, autumn, < AS. hærfest, autumn (as one of the four seasons lenten, sumor, herfest, winter, without reference, except by implication, to the gathering of crops) = D. herfst, OD. also harvest, autumn, = OHG. herbist, MHG. herbest, autumn, harvest, G. herbst, autumn, dial. harvest, vintage. The Scand. forms are contracted (in such a way as to suggest a conformation to OF. Aoust, August, also harvest-time, Bret. eost = D. oogst, harvest, < L. Augustus, August) = Icel. haust = Sw. Dan. höst, autumn. The fact that harvest in its earliest use (AS.) had no direct reference to the gathering of crops (see above) is against the current association of the word with L. carpere, pluck, Gr. καρπέω, fruit.] 1. The third season of the year; autumn; fall.

Hermost with the heite & the high sun
Was comyn into colde.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 12465.

2. The season of gathering the ripened crops; specifically, the time of reaping and gathering grain.

He that sleepeth in harvest is a son that causeth shame.
Prov. x. 5.

Clar. O, do not slander him, for he is kind.

1 Murd. Right, as snow in harvest.

Shak, Rich. III., I. 4.

3. A crop or crops gathered or ready to be gathered; specifically, ripe grain reaped, and stored in stacks or barns; hence, a supply of anything gathered at maturity and stored up; as, a harvest of nuts, or of ice.

To glean the broken ears after the man
That the main harvest reaps.
Shak, As you like it, III. 5.

Heavy harvests nod beneath the snow.

Pope, Dunciad, I. 78.

No more shall . . . Peace
Pipe on her pastoral hillock a languid note,
And watch her harvest ripen.

Tennyson, Maud, xxviii.

Hence—4. The product of any labor, or the result of any course of action; gain; result; effect; consequence.

What is that to him that reaps not harvest of his youthful joys?
Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

5. The act or process of harvesting.

Look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest.
John iv. 35.

The peasants urge their harvest, ply the fork.
Cowper, Table Talk, I, 214.

To owe one a day in harvest, to owe a good deed when it shall be most needed, in return for a favor received.

Heark thee, man, I love thee a day in harst; . . . I'll pay up your thousand pund Scots.
Scott, Rob Roy, xxiii.

harvest (här'vest), v. t. [ME. hervesten = OD. herfsten = G. herbsten, draw near autumn, dial. harvest, = Ice. harustu, draw near autumn, = Sw. hösta = Dan. høste, harvest; from the noun.] To reap or gather, as corn and other crops, for the use of man and beast: often used figuratively.

Men hervesten the corn twyes a geer.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 300.

I have seen a stock of reeds harvested and stacked, worth two or three hundred pounds. Pennant, Tour in Scotland.

harvest-apple (här'vest-ap'1), n. A small early variety of apple ripening in August.

harvest-bells (här'vest-belz), n. A beautiful gentian, Gentiana Pneumonanthe, found in nearly all parts of Europe, but rare in England. It is a perennial herb nearly a foot high, with linear leaves, and bright-blue corolla an inch and a half long, striate with fine greenish lines. It blooms in harvest-time, whence the name.

harvest-bug (här'vest-bug), n. 1. Same as harvest-tick.

This animal (which we call a harvest bug) is very minute, . . . of a bright scarlet colour, and of the genus of Acarus.
Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, xxxiv.

2. Same as harvest-fly. [New Eng.]

harvest-doll (här'vest-dol), n. Same as harvest-queen.

harvester (här'ves-tér), n. 1. One who harvests.

Would she were mine, and I to-day,

Like her, a harvester of hay.

Whittier, Maud Muller.

2. A machine for gathering field-crops, such as grain, beans, flax, potatoes, etc.; specifically, a reaping-machine. Any machine for gathering field-crops is called a harvester, except the grass cutting machines, which are called mowers or mowing-machines; any grain-harvesting machine also, except the heading-machine, is called a reaper. See mower and reaper.

3. A harvest-spider or harvestman.

harvest-feast (här'vest-fést), n. A feast made at the ingathering of the harvest.

harvest-field (här'vest-féld), n. A field from which a harvest is gathered.

The country people bring home from the harvest field . . . a figure made with corn, round which the men and the women were promiscuously singing, and preceded by a piper or a drum. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 468.

My brother James is in the harvest-field.

Tennyson, The Brook.

harvest-fish (här'vest-fish), n. 1. The butterfish, dollar-fish, or lafayette, Stromateus triacanthus. [New Jersey, U.S.]—2. Another species of Stromateidae, Stromateus parvulus, distinguished by the production of the anterior dorsal and anal rays and the suborbicular body. It visits the North American coast in the autumn, at harvest-time.

harvest-fly (här'vest-flī), n. A homopterous insect of the family Cicadidae; a lyerman. Cicada tibicen is known as the dog-day harvest-fly in the United States; it is a near relative of the seventeen year cicada, and, like it, is often called locust. Sometimes called harvest-bug.

harvest-geese (här'vest-gēs), n. Same as stubble-geese.

harvest-home (här'vest-hōm'), n. 1. The time of gathering the harvest; the bringing home of the harvest; hence, any opportunity for making advantage or gain.

And his chin, new reap'd,

Show'd like a stubble-land at harvest-home.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3.

2. A festival held by the English peasantry in August in honor of the homing of the harvest. It was formerly observed by farm-laborers, servants, and the whole rural community, with universal merrymaking, feasting, songs and dances, and processions of oxen and horses with decorated carts and implements of husbandry. At present little remains of this custom but a supper.

As we were returning to our inn (in or near Windsor), we happened to meet some country people celebrating their harvest-home: their last load of corn they crown with flowers, having besides an image richly dressed, by which perhaps they signify Ceres; this they keep moving about, while the men and women, and men and maid servants, riding through the streets in the cart, shout as loud as they can till they arrive at the barn.

Hentzner (end of 16th century), quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 467.

3. The song sung at this festival.

Crown'd with the ears of corn, now come

And, to the pipe, sing harvest-home. Herrick.

We have ploughed, we have sowed,

We have reaped, we have mowed,

We have brought home every load,

Hip, hip, hip, Harvest home!

Hone's Every-Day Book, II, 1164.

harvesting-machine (här'vest-ting-mā-shēn'), n. A harvester. See harvester, 2.

harvest-lady (här'vest-lā'dī), n. The second reaper in a row. [Prov. Eng.]

harvestless (här'vest-less), a. Without harvest.

These judgments on the land—

Harvestless autumns, horrible agues, plague.

Tennyson, Queen Mary, v. 1.

harvest-lord (här'vest-lōrd), n. The head reaper at the harvest, or the first reaper in a row. [Prov. Eng.]

harvest-louse (här'vest-lous), n. Same as harvest-tick.

harvestman (här'vest-man), n.; pl. harvestmen (-men). 1. A laborer in harvest.

Like to a harvest-man, that's task'd to mow

Or all, or lose his hire. Shak., Cor., i. 3.

2. A harvester, shepherd-spider, gray-bear, or daddy-long-legs; an arachnid, such as those of the genus Phalangium, having a very small globose body with long slim legs. Also harvest-spider.

harvest-mite (här'vest-mīt), n. Same as harvest-tick; especially, a mite of the genus Trombidium or family Trombididae.

harvest-month (här'vest-mūnth), n. [ME. hervestmoneth, < AS. hærfestmōnath (= D. herfstmaand, September, = OHG. herbistmānōth, MHG. herbestmānōt, autumnal month, der erste herbistmānōth, the first harvest-month, September, G. herbstmonat = Dan. høstmaaned = Sw. höstmånad), September, < hærfest, autumn, + mōnath, month.] The month when the principal harvests are gathered; specifically, in Great Britain, the month of September.

harvest-moon (här'vest-mōn), n. The full moon nearest to the autumnal equinox. At that season the moon, when nearly full, rises for several consecutive nights at about the same hour, so that there is an unusual proportion of moonlight evenings. The phenomenon is more striking in higher latitudes than in the United States, and disappears entirely in the tropics. It is most marked when the ascending node of the moon's orbit is at or near the vernal equinox, as it was in 1894. The phenomenon is due to the fact that at the time of the autumnal equinox the full moon (necessarily opposite to the sun) is in that part of its orbit which makes the least possible angle with the eastern horizon at the point where the moon rises.

The full moon which happens on or nearest to the 21st of September is called the harvest-moon.

Sir J. F. W. Herschel, Outlines of Astronomy, § 428 b.

Preserving distinct statements of certain color facts—as that the harvest-moon at rising was of such and such a red.

Ruskin, Elements of Drawing, iii.

harvest-mouse (här'vest-mous), n. A very small murine rodent or mouse, Mus minutus, abundant in Europe, nesting in grain, and therefore specially observable in harvest-time. It is one of the very smallest of mice, being about 2½ inches in length, with a tail nearly as long.

Harvest-mouse (Mus minutus or messorius) and its Nest.

harvest-queen (här'vest-kwēn), n. An image representing Ceres, formerly carried about on the last day of harvest. Also called kern-baby and harvest-doll.

harvestry (här'vest-rī), n. [< harvest + -ry.] The act or industry of harvesting; also, that which is harvested. Swinburne.

harvest-spider (här'vest-spi'dér), n. Same as harvestman, 2.

harvest-tick (här'vest-tik), n. One of several different mites or acarids which are abundant and troublesome late in the summer and in autumn. They attach themselves like ticks to the skin, become gorged with blood, and occasion much inconvenience. They are also called harvest-lice, harvest-mites, harvest-bugs, and red lice, and were formerly all placed in a spurious genus Leptus, which is composed of the Harvest-ticks, much magnified.

"Leptus" irritans. Trombidium americanum.

six-legged immature forms of various mites, mainly harvest-mites or trombidids, but also includes certain spinning-mites or tetranychids. Thus, in England, the common harvest-bug is Tetranychus (formerly "Leptus") autumnalis. In the United States the same name is given to the six-legged or Leptus stage of a mite called "Leptus" irritans, the adult of which is unknown, but is probably a species of Tetranychus; and also to a true harvest-mite with eight legs, Trombidium americanum. See Leptus, Trombidium.

Harveyize (här've-i-iz), v. t. [From H. A. Harvey, an American inventor.] To subject the face of (a steel plate, particularly a steel armor-plate), for the purpose of chilling, to a process of cementation which increases the carbon in that portion of the plate and produces a plate with a comparatively soft and ductile body and a very hard face.

Harvey's vine. See vine.

harwe¹, n. A Middle English form of harrow 1.

harwe², v. t. A Middle English form of harrow 2.

has¹ (haz). The third person singular present indicative of have.

has², a. An early Middle English form of hoarse.

hasard¹, n. An obsolete spelling of hazard.

hasardour¹, n. An obsolete spelling of hazardier.

hasardriet¹, n. Same as hazardry.

has-been (haz'bēn or -bin), n. A person, thing, belief, etc., that belongs exclusively to the past; something out of date or past use.

hase¹, n. An obsolete spelling of haze 1.

hase², v. t. An obsolete spelling of haze 2.

hasel, n. See hazel.

hash¹ (hash), v. t. [Ult. F. hacher, chop, mince; but the E. verb is due rather to the noun hash, which is from a deriv. of the F. verb; of earlier introduction, from the same F. verb, is E. hatch. See hatch 3 and hack 1, which are doublets of hash 1.] To chop; especially, to chop into small pieces; mince; hence, to mangle.

There was such hashing, and broad swords a-clashing, Brave Forfar himself got a claw.

Battle of Sheriff-Muir (Child's Ballads, VII, 159).

One slip . . . would topple the stumbler and his burden down to be hashed against jutting points, and tossed, fragmentary food for fishes, in the lucid pool below.

T. Winthrop, Canoe and Saddle, ix.

hash¹ (hash), n. [Abbr. of older hachey or hachee, < OF. hachis, minced meat (cf. haggis), < hacher, hack, shred, slice, hew, chop, cut in pieces, < G. hacken = E. hack 1: see hack 1 and hatch 3.] 1. That which is hashed or chopped; especially, minced meat.—2. Specifically, a dish of meat and potatoes, previously cooked, chopped up together and cooked again.

The cook should be reminded that, if the meat in a hash or mince be allowed to boil, it will immediately be hard.

Miss Acton, Modern Cookery.

Hence—3. Any mixture and second preparation of old material; a repetition; a reexhibition.

Old pieces are revived, and scarcely any new ones admitted; the public are again obliged to ruminate over those hashes of absurdity which were disgusting to our ancestors even in an age of ignorance.

Goldsmith, Polite Learning.

4. A sloven; a country clown; a stupid or silly fellow. [Scotch.]

I canna thole the clash . . .
Of this impertinent auld hash.

Ramsey, Poems, II. 455.

5. Low railery; ribaldry. [Colloq.]—To make a hash of, to cut or knock to pieces; make a mess of; destroy or ruin completely. [Colloq.]

He comes, bold Drake, the chief who made a Fine hash of all the powers of Spain.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 349.

To settle one's hash, to subdue or silence one; put an end to one. [Slang.]

Brave Prudhoe triumphant shall skim the wide main,
The hash of the Yankees he'll settle.

Song, quoted in Brockett's Glossary.

hash² (hash), a. A dialectal variant of harsh.
hashish, hashesh (hash'esh), n. [Cf. Ar. Pers. hashish, herbage, hay, an intoxicating preparation of Cannabis sativa, var. Indica, or Indian hemp.] 1. The tops and tender parts of Indian hemp (Cannabis sativa, var. Indica), called in India ganjah (which see), together with a resinous exudation upon them, gathered after flowering. See hemp, and Indian hemp (under hemp).—2. An intoxicating preparation of this plant, which is either smoked or drunk as an infusion: called in India bhung (which see).

The use of Hashesh—which is a preparation of the dried leaves of the Cannabis indica—has been familiar to the East for many centuries.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 133.

hash¹ (hash), a. An obsolete or dialectal form of harsh.

After dyeing, wool should still feel soft, and not harsh or hash.
Benedikt, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 42.

hash², n. [W. hesg, sedge, rushes: see hassock.] A case made of rushes or flags; a wicker basket for carrying fish.

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
So do our minutes hasten to their end.
Shak., Sonnets, lx.

I hastened to the spot whence the noise came.
Defoe, Robinson Crusoe.

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
Goldsmith, Des. Vill., l. 51.

= Syn. Hasten, Hurry. To hasten is to work, move, etc., quickly, but properly not too quickly; to hurry is to go too fast for dignity, comfort, or thoroughness: as, to hasten to tell a piece of good news; to hasten the erection of a building; to hurry through a lesson; to look hurried. While hasten has come to be thus used only in a good sense, haste, n., hasty, and hastiness retain a bad meaning as well as a good: as, the book was evidently written in haste; he had a hasty temper; he had occasion to regret his hastiness. Indeed, hasty and hastiness usually convey censure.

II. trans. To cause to move or act with celerity; cause to make haste; drive or urge forward; expedite.

Yet for all that that they might hem hasten, thise other were vpon hem er thei might be half a-raied of her harneys.

The copper, provided with a hat to receive impurities that subside, and to enable spent lye to be removed completely by the draw-off.
W. L. Carpenter, Soap and Candles, p. 156.

Cardinal's hat. (a) See cardinal. (b) In her., a representation of the red hat, having the tassels on each side arranged as described under cardon.—Chimney-pot hat, a hat with a high, nearly cylindrical crown and a relatively narrow brim: a common head-dress of men in the eighteenth century. Also called pot-hat, plug-hat, and stonepipe hat or stonepipe.—Cocked hat. See cock.—Captain hat. See captain.—Crush hat. See crush-hat.—Gainsborough hat, a hat with a broad brim, similar to those seen in some of the portraits of ladies by Thomas Gainsborough, an English painter of the eighteenth century.—Gibus hat [named from the inventor, a hater in London], a hat the crown of which collapses and can be pressed flat, being held firmly in place by springs when open; an opera-hat.—Gipsy hat. See gipsy.—Hat of estate. Same as cap of maintenance (which see, under maintenance).—Hat of Mont Alban or Montalban. Same as chapeau Montaubain (which see, under chapeau).—Iron hat, in mining, same as gorran. [U. S.]—Panama hat, a fine plaited hat made of the young leaves (before expansion) of a stemless screw-pine (Carludovicia palmata) by the natives of Central America. They are commonly worn in the West Indies and frequently on the American continent.—Red hat, a cardinal's hat. See cardinal.

It may buy the red hat yet. C. Kingsley, Westward Ho.

To give one a (one's) hat, to lift the hat to one, or to take it off in his presence; salute by lifting the hat.

I said nothing to you, but gave you my hat as I passed you.
History of Col. Jack (1723).
To hang up one's hat in a house, to make one's self at home; to be continually in another's house, especially if not very welcome.

The merchants of Calcutta are celebrated for a frank and liberal hospitality, which dates from the time when every European hung up his hat in his banker's or his agent's house on his arriving in the country.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I, 107.

To have a brick in one's hat. See brick².—To pass round the hat, to present a hat or any other convenient receptacle to receive contributions, as at a public meeting; hence, to ask for money for charitable use or some purpose of common interest.

Lamartine, after passing round the hat in Europe and America, takes to his bed from wounded pride when the French Senate votes him a subsidy, and sheds tears of humiliation. Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 370.

To thumb the hat, to determine the order or succession of the watches on board a fishing-schooner. Five or more men, each representing a dory, form a circle about the captain, placing each a thumb on the inside of the rim of a hat. The skipper, beginning at random, counts on the thumbs until he reaches the seventh. This seventh man has the first watch, the process being repeated for the other watches.

hat¹ (hat), v. t.; pret. and pp. hatted, ppr. hating. [hat¹, n.] 1. To provide with a hat: used chiefly in composition: as, straw-hatted girls.

That was a spurred heel which had rung on the pavement, and that was a hatted head which now passed under the arched porte-cochère of the hotel.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xv.

The bonneting of some unhappy wretch who has had the audacity to wear . . . a high beaver hat. . . . Woe be to the hatted one should he attempt to resent their actions.

The Century, XXVI, 875.

2. To place a hat upon the head of.

Cardinals hatted at Rome.

New York Semi-weekly Tribune, March 22, 1887.

3. To secure, as a seat, by placing one's hat upon it, as is done in the British House of Commons. [Colloq.]

At 2 o'clock all was quiet in and about the House. Twenty seats had, however, been hatted before noon to secure them for the debate.

Philadelphia Times, April 10, 1886.

hat², a. A Middle English form of ho¹.

hat³, n. An obsolete form of hate¹.

hat⁴ (hat), n. See ho³.

hatable, hateable (hă'ta-bl), a. [hate² + -able.] Capable or worthy of being hated; odious.

Really a most notable, questionable, hateable, lovable old Marquis.
 Carlyle, Mirabeau.

hatamoto (hă'tă-mō'tō), n. [Jap., < hata, flag, + moto, under.] A feudatory vassal of the Tokugawa shoguns of Japan.

hatband (hat'band), n. 1. A band or ribbon placed about a hat just above the brim. A broader band of some black material, such as crape, is often worn as mourning. In Great Britain a broad band of bombazine, with bows at the back and hanging ends of some length, is worn on the hat by the undertaker and his assistants at funerals, similar bands of crape, but with shorter ends, being worn by the chief mourners then and for some time thereafter.

I became conscious of the servile Pumblechook in a black cloak and several yards of hat-band. . . . We were all going to "follow." Dickens, Great Expectations, xxv.

2. In her., a bearing representing a ribbon, or sometimes a sort of braid ending in tassels.—Dick's hatband, a phrase used satirically in proverbial comparisons, such as as queer as Dick's hatband, as tight as Dick's hatband. The allusion is to the authority (assumed to be typified by the royal crown) conferred upon Richard (Dick) Cromwell as Lord Protector of England, in succession to his father Oliver Cromwell, for which he was notoriously unfit. He held it from September, 1658, to May, 1659, when he resigned.—Gold hatband, a nobleman at a university; a tuft. Davies.

His companion is ordinarily some stale fellow that has been notorious for an angle to gold hatbands, whom he admires at first, afterwards scorns.

Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, Young Gentleman of the Université.

hat-block (hat'blok), n. The block or mold on which a hat is formed. It consists of several pieces fastened together.

hat-body (hat'bod'i), n. The unshaped or partly shaped piece of felt from which a hat is to be formed.

hat-box (hat'boks), n. 1. A box in which a hat is kept or carried, often of stout leather and approximately of the shape of the hat.—2. A small light trunk, nearly cubical in shape, containing a tray or compartment for a hat or bonnet.

hat-brush (hat'brush), n. A soft brush for brushing hats.

hat-case (hat'kās), n. Same as hat-box.

hatch¹ (hach), n. [= E. dial. and Sc. unassibilated hack, heck, a half-door, wicket, also a rack or frame (for various purposes: see hack², heck¹], < ME. hache, hacche, hetche, hecche, also unassibilated heke ("hekke"), hek, hec, a half-door, wicket, gate, in pl. hacches, hatches (of a ship), < AS. hæc (hæcco), fem. (in dat. hæcce, hecce, hacce), appar. meaning a gate or wicket (also in comp. hæc-wær, a weir for catching fish: see def. 7), = MD. heck, hecke, a bar, a rail, the bar or bolt of a door, a grating, a flood-gate, etc., D. hek, a rail, fence, gate, = MLG. heck, LG. hek, a lattice, a gate or turnstile (keese-hek, a rack for cheese), = Sw. häck, a rack, = Dan. hæk, hekke, a rack; prop., it seems, anything made with bars or cross-bars, being closely connected with AS. hæc (hæcco), fem. (in dat. hæcce, hecce, neut. nom., a crosier, < haca (only in glosses, where sometimes less prop. nom. hæca), a bar, the bar or bolt of a door, prob. orig. a hook, as in mod. E. dial. hake, a hook: see hake¹ and hake².] 1. A half-door, or a door with an opening over it: a grated or latticed door or gate; a wicket.

"Were ich with hym, by Crist," quath ich, "ich wolde neuere for hym, Thauh ich my by-lyue sholde begge a-boute at menne hacches."
Piers Plouman (C), xvii, 335.

With throwing thus my head,
 Dogs leap the hatch, and all are fled.
Shak., Lear, iii, 6.

If by the dairy's hatch I chance to hie,
 I shall her goodly countenance espy.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Friday, I, 55.

Hatch.—The lower half of a door. . . . Sometimes applied also to a gate. The gate which formerly divided Whitebury forest from the Brackley road was designated Brackley Hatch, or Syresham Hatch, from its contiguity to those places.

A. E. Baker, Northamptonshire Words and Phrases.

2. A grate or frame of cross-bars laid over an opening in a ship's deck; hence, any cover of an opening in a ship's deck. A hatch accidentally turned upside down, or dropped in the hold of the vessel, is superstitiously regarded as an omen of bad luck.

When the schipmen with the wolf were wel passed,
 The hert & the hinde than hoped wel to schape, & busked hem bothe some a-boue the hacches.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I, 2770.

He poureth pesen upon the hacches sidre.

Chaucer, Good Women, I, 648.

We hoysed out our boat, and took up some of them; as also a small hatch, or scuttle raft, belonging to some bark.
Dampier, Voyages, an, 1688.

3. An opening, generally rectangular, in a ship's deck, for taking in or discharging the cargo, or for affording a passage into the interior of the ship; a hatchway. The fore-hatch is generally just forward of the foremast, the main-hatch forward of the mainmast, and the after-hatch between the main- and mizzenmasts. See cut under hatchway.

The briny seas, which saw the ship infold thee,
 Would vault up to the hatches to behold thee.
Drayton, De la Poole to Queen Mary.

Hence—4. Any similar opening, as in the floor of a building, or a cover placed over it.—5. An opening made in a mine, or made in searching for a mine.—6. A rack for hay.

Hay hertely he had in hacches on hight.

Gawan and Gologras, II, 9.

7. A frame or weir in a river, for catching fish.

—8. A bedstead. [Scotch.]

Curst thyrd of gold! O how thou causet care!
 My bed of Down I change for hatches bare;
 Rather than rest, this stormy war I chose.
 T' enlarge my fields, both land and life I lose.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Schisme.

A rude wooden stool, and still ruder hatch or bedframe.
Scott.

9. A hollow trap to catch weasels and other animals. [Prov. Eng.]—Under hatches. (a) Below deck; off duty: said of a naval officer or sailor, often implying that he is under arrest or suspended from duty.

To the king's ship, invisible as thou art:
 There shalt thou find the mariners asleep
 Under the hatches.
Shak., Tempest, v, 1.

(b) Under close confinement; in servitude.
 He assures us how this fatherhood continued its course till the captivity in Egypt, and then the poor fatherhood was under hatches.
Locke, Government, i, 2.

hatch¹ (hach), v. t. [hatch¹, n.] To close with or as with a hatch.

If in our youths we could pick up some pretty estate,
 'twere not amiss to keep our door hatched.
Shak., Pericles, iv, 3.

Sleep begins with heavy wings
 To hatch mine eyes.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I, 522).

hatch² (hach), v. [ME. hacchen (pret. hagte, haihte, pp. ihacht) (not in AS.) = MHG. G. hecken = Sw. häcka = Dan. hekke, hatch, produce young from eggs by incubation (G. hecken comprehends the laying of the eggs, and even the pairing and nesting; in common language it is not applied to domestic fowls). Cf. hatch², n.

The asserted derivation from hatch¹ ("to hatch birds is to produce them under a hatch or coop")—Skeat is improbable, because the notion is a more general one; the earliest instances (ME.) refer to the owl and other non-domestic birds, which do not hatch under a coop; moreover, hatch¹ does not mean in E. a coop or breeding-cage, and the Sw. Dan. G. nouns with this sense are prop. derivatives of the verb, though easily confused (in Sw. Dan.) with the other noun meaning 'rack,' = E. hatch¹. Wedgwood's assertion that hatch² is identical with hack¹ (cf. hatch³, ult. = hack¹), because "the young bird is supposed to peck its way out of the shell" (G. hacken, hack, also peck or strike with the bill), is negated by the difference in the ME. forms (pres. and pret.). The word is prob. an independent verb, of which early record is lost.] I. trans. 1. To cause to develop in and emerge from (an egg) by incubation or other natural process, or by artificial heat; cause the developed young to emerge from (an egg).

As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not.
Jer. xlvii, 11.

That you should hatch gold in a furnace, sir,
 As they do eggs in Egypt!
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii, 1.

Insects which do not sit upon their eggs deposit them in those particular situations in which the young, when hatched, find their appropriate food.

Foley, Nat. Theol., xviii.

2. To contrive or plot, especially secretly; form by meditation, and bring into being; originate and produce: as, to hatch mischief; to hatch heresy.

The whole Senate of Jewish, Saracenicall, and Christian Astrologers together hatching his Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 13.

Thine are fancies hatch'd
 In silken-folded idleness.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

Hatching apparatus, an artificial incubator for bringing forth chickens from eggs by the agency of heat. See incubator.—To count one's chickens before they are hatched. See chicken.

II. intrans. 1. To be hatched, as the eggs of birds, reptiles, fishes, insects, etc.: as, the eggs hatch in two weeks, in the water, under ground, etc.—2. To come forth from or out of the egg: as, the chicks hatch naked in ten days.

Open your bee-hives, for now they hatch.

Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, April.

hatch² (hach), n. [Cf. G. hecke (not in MHG.), a hatching, a hatch, brood, breed, also breeding- or hatching-time, breeding-cage, aviary, = Sw. häck, a coop, = Dan. hæk, hatching, breeding (cf. hækketur, breeding-cage (see bover¹), hækketid, hatching- or nesting-time); from the verb: see hatch², v.] 1. A brood; as many young birds as are produced at one time, or by one incubation.—2. The number of eggs incubated at one time; a clutch.—3. The act of hatching; also, that which is hatched, in either sense of that word.

There's something in his soul

O'er which his melancholy sits on brood:
 And, I do doubt, the hatch, and the disclose,
 Will be some danger.
Shak., Hamlet, iii, 1.

hatch³ (hach), v. t. [Early mod. E.; < OF. hacher, hatch, shred, slice, hew, chop, cut in pieces, also hatch (a hilt), F. hacher, < MHG. G. hacken, cut: see hack¹. Cf. hash¹.] 1. To chase; engrave; mark with cuts or lines.

Who first shall wound, through others' arms, his blood appearing fresh,
 Shall win this sword, silver'd and hatcht.
Chapman.

And such again,
 Should . . . knit all hatcht in silver,
 To his experienc'd tongue.
Shak., T. and C., i, 8.

Why should not I
 Doat on my horse well trap'd, my sword well hatcht?
Fletcher, Bonduca, ii.

A rymer is a fellow whose face is hatcht all over with impudence, and should hee be hang'd or pilloried 'tis armed for it.
Sir T. Overbury, Characters.

Thy hair is fine as gold, thy chin is hatch'd
 With silver.
Shirley, Love in a Maze, ii, 2.

2. Specifically, in drawing, engraving, etc., to shade by means of lines; especially, to shade with lines crossing one another. See hatching and cross-hatching.

Those hatching strokes of the pencil.
Dryden.

Though very rich and varied in effect, the tapestry of the best period usually is woven with not more than twenty different tints of wool—half tints and gradations being got by hatching one colour into another.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 212.

3. To lay in small and numerous bands upon a ground of different material: as, laces of silver hatched on a satin ground.

hatch³ (hach), n. [< hatch³, v.] A shading line in drawing or engraving.

To discern an original print from a copy print . . . is a knack very easily attained; because 'tis almost impossible to imitate every hatch, and to make the strokes of exact and equal dimensions. Evelyn, Sculptura, v.

hatch-bar (hach'bür), n. One of the iron bars with which the hatches of a ship are secured.

hatch-boat (hach'böt), n. A kind of half-decked fishing-boat; a boat that has a hatch or well for holding fish. Simmonds.

hatchel (hach'el), n. [An assimilated form of hackle, heckle, q. v.] An instrument consisting of long iron teeth set in a board, used in cleansing flax or hemp from the tow and hard, or coarse part; a hackle or heckle. Also hetchel.

And yet the same must be better kemberd with hatchel-teeth of yron. . . until it be cleansed from all the grosse bark and rind among. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xix. 1.

hatchel (hach'el), v. t.; pret. and pp. hatcheled or hatchelled, ppr. hatcheling or hatchelling. [An assimilated form of hackle, heckle, q. v.] 1. To draw, as flax or hemp, through the teeth of a hatchel, to separate the fiber from the hard or coarse parts of the plant; hackle or heckle.

The Russians do spin and hatchel it (hemp), and the English tarre it in three and lay the cable.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 364.

Hence—2. To tease or vex by sarcasms or reproaches; heckle.

Also hetchel.

hatcheler, hatcheller (hach'el-er), n. [< hatch-el + -er. Cf. hackler, heckler.] One who hatchels or hackles flax or hemp.

hatcher (hach'er), n. [< hatch² + -er.] 1. One who hatches; a contriver; a plotter.

A man ever in haste, a great hatcher and breeder of business. Swift, Tale of a Tub, ix.

2. A bird that hatches; also, any apparatus for hatching eggs, as a hatching-box or -trough; an incubator.

hatchery (hach'eri), n.; pl. hatcheries (-iz). [< hatch², v., + -ery.] A place for hatching eggs; an arrangement for promoting the hatching of eggs, especially those of fish, by artificial appliances.

By the request of the Commissioner, such fish were kept alive until they could be put into the live box at the hatchery. Science, III. 54.

hatchet (hach'et), n. [< ME. hachet (also ingeniously accom. hackup (Prompt. Parv.), mod. as if hack-chip*), < OF. hachette, a hatchet or small ax, dim. of hache, an ax, = Fr. apcha = Sp. pacha = Pg. facha, hacha = It. accia, azza (mixed with ascia, < L. ascia, an ax: see ax¹), < G. hache, a hatchet, mattock, pickax, = MD. hache, an ax, a hoe, D. hak, a hoe: see hack¹, n.] A small ax with a short handle, designed to be used with one hand.—Ceremonial hatchet, an object resembling an ax or a hatchet, sometimes made with a stone head and with the handle elaborately sculptured, but more commonly a mere imitation of a hatchet in thin wood or the like. Such initiative or emblematic weapons are in use in several of the South Sea islands in religious ceremonies.—To take or dig up the hatchet, to make war; to bury the hatchet, to make peace: phrases derived from the customs of the North American Indians. See tomahawk.

Spain, Portugal, and France, have not yet shut their doors against us: it will be time enough when they do, to take up the commercial hatchet.

Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 362.

Shingis, sachem of the Delawares, . . . took up the hatchet at various times against the English.

Irving, Washington, I. 78.

Buried was the bloody hatchet, . . . There was peace among the nations.

Longfellow, Hiawatha, xiii.

To throw the helve after the hatchet. See helve.

hatchet-face (hach'et-fäs), n. A face with sharp and prominent features; a face like a hatchet.

An ape his own dear image will embrace; An ugly bean adores a hatchet-face. Dryden.

hatchet-faced (hach'et-fäst), a. Having a hatchet-face; having a thin face with prominent features.

hatchet-shaped (hach'et-shäpt), a. Having the shape of a hatchet; dolabriform.

hatchet-stake (hach'et-stäk), n. A small anvil from 2 to 10 inches wide, used in bending thin metals.

hatchettin, hatchettine (hach'et-in), n. [After the English chemist Charles Hatchett (1765–1847), the discoverer of columbium and tantalum.] 1. A fatty substance occurring in thin flaky veins in the argillaceous ironstone of Merthyr-Tydvil in Wales and in other localities. It is like wax or spermaceti in consistence, of a yellowish-white or greenish-yellow color, and inodorous when cold, but of a slightly bituminous odor when heated, or after fusion. It is also called adipocera mineral and mineral tallova. (See adipocera.) It consists of 86 per cent. of carbon and 14 of hydrogen. Also hatchettite.

2. A soft mineral containing 80 per cent. of carbon and 20 of hydrogen, found in cavities of carboniferous rocks in Saxony. Also called chrismatin, chrismatine.

hatchettolite (hach'et-öl-lit), n. [< Hatchett (see hatchettin) + Gr. λίθος.] A mineral related to pyrochlore. It is found with samarskite in North Carolina. It occurs in octahedral crystals, and is essentially a tantaloniobate of uranium and calcium. It contains a little water, which may be due to partial alteration.

hatchet-vetch (hach'et-vech), n. A plant, Securigera coronilla, the pods of which are falcate and thin-edged. See azfitch and Securigera.

The Grecians name this, whether it be a Pulse, or an infinitum among corn, ὀδωσπος: the Latines, of the forme of the seed, Securidaca, and Hedyssarum: in English, Ax-seed, Axwort, Ax-fitch, and hatchet Vetch. Gerardus, Herbal (1636), p. 1236.

hatching (hach'ing), n. [Verbal n. of hatch³, v.] 1. In drawing, engraving, etc., the art of disposing lines, especially parallel lines, whether curved, straight, or wavy, so as to give the effect of shading, according to the shape and character of the object represented. In cross-hatching the lines form lozenges or squares. If the hatching are double or triple, the lines which indicate form predominate over the rest.

2. A line made for this purpose, or such lines collectively.

As for the graving, so the contours and outlines be well designed, I am not solicitous for the hatching (as they call it). Evelyn, To Mr. Benjamin Tooke (Printer).

Also hachure, hachure.

hatching-box (hach'ing-boks), n. A device for holding the eggs of fish in artificial fish-culture. Hatching-boxes are made in a great variety of forms, according to the habits of the fish from which the eggs are taken and the location.

hatching-jar (hach'ing-jär), n. A conical receptacle placed with the apex downward, and containing fish-eggs for hatching. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 128.

hatching-trough (hach'ing-tröf), n. A trough for artificially hatching fish-eggs. It is a rectangular wooden trough of convenient length (generally from 10 to 12 feet), and usually 6 or 8 inches deep by 12 to 14 inches wide. The trough is sometimes provided with a transverse screen at the head or upper end, to disperse or generalize the inflowing current of water, and such a screen is always placed at the lower end of the trough, to prevent the escape of the fish. The eggs are hatched either on wire-cloth trays or on gravel spread on the floor of the trough.

hatchment (hach'ment), n. [Formerly also atchment, achment, achement, early mod. E. hache-ment, a contraction, through a form atcheament, of achievement, formerly also spelled achievment. See achievement, 3.] 1. In her.: (a) An escutcheon or armorial shield granted in recognition of some distinguished achievement; an achievement (in sense 3). Especially—(b) A funeral achievement; a square tablet set diagonally and bearing the arms of a deceased person, placed over a tomb or upon the exterior of the house in which the person dwelt. The surroundings of the shield of arms are so distinguished that the sex and condition of the deceased can be known: thus, an unmarried man has his shield and crest upon a black ground; an unmarried woman, a lozenge bearing her arms with a knot instead of a crest, also on a black ground.

Hatchment of an Esquire—his arms impaled with those of his wife, the wife surviving.

For married persons the shield is impaled (see impale-ment); and in case a widow or widower survives, that half of the shield or lozenge which bears the arms of the survivor carries them upon a white background, the half appropriated to the deceased having a black background. A bishop's arms, being impaled with those of his see, are relieved on a black background, those of the see having a white one. When a person is the last of his race, a skull is put above the shield or lozenge in the place of the crest. In the case of a member of the Order of the Garter who is a married man, or of his wife, two shields are displayed side by side, that on the dexter side having the knight's arms alone surrounded by the motto of the order, that on the sinister having the coats of husband and wife.

Houses where funeral hatchments for murdered inmates had been perpetually suspended were decked with garlands. Motley, Dutch Republic, II. 265.

Hence—2. Any distinguishing mark, badge of honor, symbol, or the like, as the sword of a soldier.

Receive these pledges, These hatchments of our griefs, and grace us so much To place 'em on his hearse. Fletcher, Bonduca, v. 1.

For, as I am condemned, my naked sword Stands but a hatchment by me; only held To show I was a soldier. Fletcher, Valentinian, iv. 4.

Let there be deducted, out of our main portion, Five marks in hatchments to adorn this thigh.

Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, ii.

hatchure (hach'ör), n. [See hachure.] Same as hatching.

hatchway (hach'wä), n. [< hatch¹ + -way.] 1. A square or oblong opening in the deck of a ship, affording a passage from one deck to another, or into the hold or lower apartments. See hatch¹, n., 3.—2. The opening of any trap-door, as in a floor, ceiling, or roof.

hat-die (hat'di), n. A block upon which a hat-body is molded to the desired shape of the hat. Also called hat-mold.

hate¹ (hät), v.; pret. and pp. hated, ppr. hating. [< ME. haten, hätien, < AS. hätian, hätigian = OS. haton, hatan = OFries. hatia = D. haten = MLG. LG. haten = OHG. hazzen, hazzen, MHG. hazzen, G. hassen = Icel. hata = Sw. hata = Dan. hade = Goth. hathan and hatan, hate. A secondary form appears in AS. hettian* (only in ppr. as a noun, hettend, an enemy) = OHG. hezzen, MHG. G. hetzen, bait, hunt, set on, incite. The orig. meaning involves the notion of pursuing with hatred. See the noun. Hence, through OF., heinous, q. v.] I. trans. 1. To regard with a strong and passionate dislike or aversion; regard with extreme ill-will.

His enell speche made hym to be hätid of a-monge his felowes, and also of straungers that herden of hym speke, that after refuseden to go in his felishipe to seche a-ventures. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 135.

Pride has made a Lady swear she hated such a Man, tho' she was dying for the sight of him. Mrs. Centlivre, the Man's Bewitch'd, I.

Some minds by nature are averse to noise, And hate the tumult half the world enjoys. Cowper, Retirement, I. 176.

2. In a weakened sense, to dislike; be averse; be unwilling; commonly with an infinitive.

I hate to leave my friend in his extremities. Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, ii. 1.

3. To have little regard for, or less than for some other; despise in comparison with something else regarded as more worthy: a use of the word in Scripture.

If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, . . . he cannot be my disciple. Luke xiv. 26.

=Syn. 1. Hate, Abhor, Detest, Abominate, Loathe. These words express the strongest forms of dislike and aversion of either persons or things. Hate may include the others; it is more permanent and includes more ill-will toward that which is hated. To abhor, literally to start from with horror, is to have all the better feelings excited against that which is abhorred: as, we abhor cruelty. To detest, literally to bear witness against, is to condemn with indignation. Abominate, by derivation and the Biblical use of its congeners, has generally reference to what is offensive to moral and religious sentiment. To loathe is primarily to have great aversion to food, and hence to have like disgust toward that which is offensive to the moral nature or the feelings.

Do good to them which hate you. Luke vi. 27.

I abhor this dilatory sloth. Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4.

I do detest false perjurd Proteus. Shak., T. G. of V., v. 4.

We do abhor, abominate, and loathe this cruelty. Southern.

II. intrans. To feel hatred: as, one who neither loves nor hates.
hate¹ (hăt), n. [< ME. hate (with vowel of the verb), reg. hete, < AS. hete, m., = OS. hēti = D. haet = MLG. hāt = OHG. haz (hazz-), m., also neut., MHG. haz (hazz-), G. hass = Icel. hatr = Sw. hat = Dan. had = Goth. hatis (gen. hatis, once gen. hatis), hate, v. (> Goth. hātizon, be angry): see hate¹, v.] 1. An emotion of extreme or passionate dislike or aversion; inveterate ill-will; hatred.

Haughty Juno's unrelenting hate. Dryden, Æneid, i. 2.
 What a fine definition of hate is that which Chaucer gives in the Persones Tale, "Hate is old wrathe." It is, however, borrowed from Cicero—"Odium ira inveterata." Tusc. Disp. iv. 9. G. P. Marsh.

Till hate,
 The seed of ill lies, told and hearkened to,
 The knot of loving memories shall undo.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 295.

2*t.* Vengeance; punishment.
 Thence arized [became terrified] Abraham & alle his mod changed[d].
 For hope [in expectation] of the harde hate that hyt [threatened] hatz oure lorde.

To ben a murder is an hateful name.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, I. 676.

Still grew my bosom then,
 Still as a stagnant fen;
 Hateful to me were men,
 The sunlight hateful.
Longfellow, Skeleton in Armor.

2. Full of hate; feeling hatred; malignant; malevolent.

Then cast a languishing regard around,
 And saw, with hateful eyes, the temples crown'd
 With golden spires, and all the hostile ground.
Dryden, Fal, and Arc., i. 214.

= Syn. I. Detestable, abominable, execrable, loathsome, heinous, foul, repulsive, revolting, abhorrent, repugnant.
hatefully (hăt'fūl-i), adv. 1. In such a manner as to excite hate; odiously.

The ceremony was hatefully tedious.
Drummond, Travels, p. 75.

2. In a manner exhibiting hate; malignantly; maliciously; spitefully.

And they shall deal with these hatefully, and shall take away all thy labour, and shall leave thee naked and bare.
Ezek. xxiii. 29.

hatefulness (hăt'fūl-nes), n. The character of being hateful, in any sense.

hatel¹, a. and n. See hattle.

hateless (hăt'les), a. [< hate¹ + -less.] Having no feeling of hate.

Phalantus of Corinth, to Amphipylus of Arcadia, sendeth the greeting of a hateless enemy.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iiii.

hat-money (hăt'mun'ē), n. Same as primage.
hat-piece (hăt'pēs), n. A hat or cap of defense other than a heavy helmet of war; especially, a secret or iron skull-cap worn under the hat.

I saw him try on his buff coat and hat-piece covered with black velvet.
Pepys, Diary, II. 216.

hat-plant (hăt'plant), n. A papilionaceous plant, Eschynomene aspera, growing in India, with odd-pinnate leaves and jointed pods: so called in commerce. In marshy places about Calcutta it attains a large size, and the thick stem is filled with a light tough pulp of which are made hats, bottle-cases, swimming-jackets, floats, and even fishing-nets. The natives call this pulp solah.

hat-press (hăt'pres), n. A machine for molding hats and pressing them into form. It consists essentially of a brass mold, which is heated, and in which the hat is placed and submitted to pressure from a plunger that enters from above, forcing the hat to the shape of the mold.

hat-rack (hăt'rak), n. A rack furnished with pegs on which hats, coats, etc., may be hung.

hat-rail (hăt'rāl), n. A hat-rack made to be hung on the wall: often a frame inclosing a small mirror.

hatred (hăt'tred), n. [< ME. hatred, hatreden, < hate, hate, + -red, -reden (as in kindred, ME. kindrede), < AS. -ræden (as in frednædræden, friendship), a suffix signifying condition, state; see -red.] The emotion or feeling of hate; hate. See hate¹, n., 1.

Sir Anna, this answers allow I no thyng,
 I holde it but hatreden, this artikill hate.
 And therefore, sir Bushoppe, at my bidding,
 Do telle me nowe twely the texte of this tale.
York Plays, p. 209.

The thought of the pain which any thing present or absent is apt to produce in us . . . we call hatred.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xx. 5.

Hatred is another name for malevolent emotion. We recognize under this title a permanent affection grounded on the intractable, as love is on tenderness.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 139.

= Syn. ill-will, Enmity, etc. (see animosity); Hatred, Dislike, Antipathy, etc. (see antipathy); Disgrace, Disfavor, Disonor (see odium); detestation, loathing, abhorrence.

hatrel, n. See hatteral.

hat-roller (hăt'rō'ler), n. In mining, a roller of cast-iron or steel, shaped like a hat, and revolving on a vertical pin, serving to guide around a curve the rope used for hauling in an incline.

hat-stand (hăt'stand), n. A hat-rack made to stand on the floor: often combined with a small table or an umbrella-stand, or both.

The hat-stand (with a whip or two standing up in it belonging to bagmen who are still snug in bed).
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 4.

hat-sweat (hăt'swet), n. That part of the lining of a hat which comes in contact with the head; a sweat-band. It is usually of leather.

He has split the hatted-kit that was for the Master's dinner.
Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xi.

Hattermist (hăt'em-ist), n. [< Hatten (see def.) + -ist.] A member of a sect in the Netherlands founded about 1683 by the deposed clergyman Pontianus van Hatten, a Spinozist, who denied the expiatory sacrifice of Christ and the freedom of the will, and affirmed that sin exists only in the imagination, and is itself its only punishment. The sect disappeared in a few years.

hatter¹ (hăt'ēr), n. [< ME. hattere; < hat¹ + -er¹.] 1. A maker or seller of hats.—2. In mining, a miner who works alone, or "under his own hat." He differs from a fossicker, who rifles old workings, or spends his time in trying abandoned wash-dirt. The hatter nearly always holds a claim under the by-laws. R. Brough Smyth. [Australia.]

Some, however, prefer to travel, and even to work, when they can get it, quite alone, and these are known to the rest as hatters. Chambers's Journal, 5th ser., II. 286.

Mad as a hatter. [A humorous simile, in which hatter was probably originally a substitute for some other more appropriate term (perhaps hatter for atter, for attercock, a spider, in which sense Halliwell doubtfully cites hatter from Palsgrave).] (a) Violently crazy or insane. (b) Violently angry.

hatter² (hăt'ēr), v. [Also hotter; a freq. form, < hat², hot², a heap.] 1. trans. 1. To gather in a heap; collect in a crowd.—2. To entangle.—3. To expose to danger; harass; trouble; weary; wear out.

Religion shows a rosy-colour'd face,
 Not hatter'd out with drudging works of grace.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, I. 371.

4. To shatter; batter.

Where hattering bullets are fine sugred plums,
 No feare of roaring guns, or thundring drums.
John Taylor, Works (1630).

(a) A part of mail armor intended originally for the protection of the neck and shoulders, but as generally used a long coat of mail coming even below the knees and, slit up the sides, and sometimes in front and behind, to allow the wearer to mount a horse.

Hauberk, 12th and 13th centuries. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français.")

Then he a-vald the coyf of his hauberke benethe his shuldres, and seide that he was but deed, but yef he wolde yelde hym to prison. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 476.

On the haubergh stroke the Prince so sore,
That quite disparted all the linked frame.
Spenser, F. Q., II. viii. 44.

(b) In the fourteenth century and later, a piece of defensive armor, probably an outer garment of splint armor. See splint, jesserant, and crevisse.

Godfrey arose; that day he laid aside
His hauberk strong, he went to combat in,
And donn'd a breast-plate fair, of proof untried,
Such one as foot-men use, light, easy, thin.
Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, xi. 20.

The border land of old romance,
Where glitter hauberk, helm, and lance.
Longfellow, Wayside Inn, Prel.

2. Among actors, a short tunic forming a part of medieval dress.—Grand hauberk, the long hauberk, reaching to the knees or below, as distinguished from the haubergeon.—White hauberk, an early name for the hauberk of ring-mail or chain-mail, to distinguish it from coats of fence which were not composed entirely or chiefly of bright iron, such as the brouge and the different stuffed and quilted garments.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 51.

I immediately hauled up for it, and found it to be an island.
Cook, First Voyage, i. 7.

3. To shift, veer, or change, as the wind.

The morning looked wild and threatening, but the clouds gradually hauled off to the eastward, leaving us the promise of a fine day.

B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 265.

To haul aboard. See aboard.—To haul in with (something), to direct the course of a ship so as to approach an object more nearly.—To haul off. (a) To turn the course of a ship so as to get further off from an object. (b) To draw off or away; withdraw, as from a movement or scheme.—To haul round (to), to veer or shift to another point of the compass: said of the wind when it gradually goes round with the sun, or in the same way as the hands of a watch.—To haul up, to come up to or to rest by a hauling or drawing action: as, seals haul up on land to breed; the boat hauled up at the wharf.

haul (há'l), n. [haul, v. Cf. *hale*¹, n.] 1. A pulling with force; a pull; a tug.

On October 6th [1869], it happens that both the sun and the moon will give a particularly vigorous haul upon the earth's waters.
R. A. Proctor, Light Science, p. 156.

2. In fishing: (a) The draft of a net: as, to catch so many fish at a haul. (b) The place where a seine is hauled.—3. That which is taken or obtained by hauling; specifically, the number or quantity of fish taken in one haul of a seine; a catch.

And the bulging nets swept shoreward,
With their silver-sided haul.
Whittier, The Sycamores.

Hence—4. Any valuable acquisition; a "find." [Colloq.]

An old forest fence . . . was a great haul for me. I sacrificed it to Vulcan, for it was past serving the god Terminus.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 263.

Haul of yarn, in rope-making, a bundle of about 400 threads, with a slight turn in it, to be tarred, the tarring being done by first dipping the bundle of yarn in a tarr-kettle, and then hauling it through nippers to press out the superfluous tar.

haulage (há'láj), n. [haul + -age.] 1. The act or labor of hauling or drawing. In coal-mining haulage is the drawing or conveying, in cars or otherwise, of the produce of the mine from the place where the coal is got to the place where it is raised to the surface. It is done by men or boys, by horses or mules drawing the cars or trams on a railway, or by hauling-ropes worked by stationary engines, which are driven by compressed air, by steam, or by water-power. This last method is chiefly used in England. When hauling-ropes are used, the cars or trams are attached to or detached from them at pleasure by means of the haulage-clip.

The company so arranges its work that the wire rope tugs do the haulage up the rapid portion of the Rhine.
Sci. Amer. Suppl., p. 446.

To have as good. Same as to have as lief, but often implying a preference. See to have lief. [Colloq.]

You had as good make a point of first giving way yourself.

Goldsmith.

To have as lief, to hold, regard, or consider as equally good: implying an objection to one course without expressing a preference for the other: chiefly with the preterit had, as in to have lief and in the later equivalent phrase to have as good. See to have lief.

Here woenith an old rebekke
That hadde almost as lief to lese hire nekke
As for to geve a peny of hire good.

Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 276.

If you moun't it, as many of your players do, I had as lief the town-crier spoke my lines. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2.

To have better (or best), to hold, regard, or find to be better or more expedient (or best or most expedient): followed by an infinitive with or (as now usually) without to, or used absolutely (the alternative being implied in the context): a phrase arising from the idiom explained in to have lief, to have rather. The form with the superlative is less common. See to have lief.

You had better leave your folly. Marlowe.

You had best to use your sword better, lest I beswinge you. Greene, Orlando Furioso, p. 110 (ed. Dyce, 1833).

He had better to doe so ten times than suffer her to love the well-nos'd poet, Ovid.

B. Jonson, Poetaster (fol. 1616 a), iv. 7.

[Modern editions omit to in this passage.]

And he that would cool and refresh himself had better goe up to the top of the next Hill then remove into a far more Northern country.

"I never in my life seed a quire go into a study to have it out about the playing and singing," pleaded Leaf.

T. Hardy, Under the Greenwood Tree, iv.

To have lief or lever, to hold, regard, or consider as preferable; prefer: an idiom appearing also in the positive form to have as lief (which see), and in the similar phrases of later origin to have rather, to have better, etc.: followed by an infinitive with or (as now usually) without to, and often, now usually, with the preterit had, which is properly the subjunctive or optative preterit with indefinite present force: I had lief, I should hold or regard it as preferable, etc. See lief.

But natheless yet have I levere to lese
My lif than of my body have a shame.

Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 632.

Yet have I levere maken hym goode chere
In honour, than myn emes lyf to lese.

H. B. Stowe, Minister's Wooing, xxix.

To have one's eye on, to have in mind.

I am very well satisfied the poet must have had his eye on the figure of this bird in ancient sculpture and painting, as indeed it was impossible to take it from the life.

Addison, Ancient Medals, ii.

To have rather, to hold, regard, or consider as preferable: a phrase equivalent to, and used like, to have lief, and of much later origin, not being found, apparently, before the sixteenth century: followed by an infinitive with or (as now usually) without to, and now only with the preterit had. See to have lief.

Poesie, which like Venus (but to better purpose), hath rather be troubled in the net with Mars, than enjoy the homelie quiet of Vulcan.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie (ed. Arber), p. 61.

I had rather to be married to a death's head than to be in his mouth than to either of these. Shak., M. of V., i. 2.

Than t' have a hangman flip me.

Dekker, Match me in London (Works, ed. 1873, IV. 106).

I had much rather be myself the slave,
And wear the bonds, than fasten them on him.

Cowper, Task, ii. 85.

This phrase, like the antecedent phrase to have lief, was also sometimes used impersonally, with a dative instead of a nominative of the person.

Me rather had my heart might feel your love,
Than my unpleas'd eye see thee go courtsey.

Shak., Rich. III., iii. 3.

To have to do with. See do, v. = Syn. 1. Hold, Own, etc. See possess.

II. intrans. To be: used indefinitely in certain idiomatic expressions and phrases, mentioned below.—Had like, was likely; came near; was on the point: followed by an infinitive.

Where they should have made head with the whole army upon the Parthians, they sent him aid by small companies; and when they were slain, they sent him others also. So that by their beastliness and lack of consideration they had like to have made all the army fly.

Str. Here's to thee, Leocrates.

Leoc. Have towards thee, Philotas.

Phil. To thee, Archippus.

W. Cartwright, Royal Slave (1651).

III. aux. An auxiliary forming, with the past participle of the principal verb, the compound tenses of verbs (including have), both transitive and intransitive, sometimes with another auxiliary: as, I have or had done it; he will have departed by that time; you should not have gone. In such cases the word have originally had its proper meaning as a transitive verb, and was so used at first only with another transitive verb, as denoting the possession of the object in the tense indicated by the past participle of the latter verb; thus, I have received a letter means literally I possess a letter received. The construction was afterward extended to cases in which the possessor of the object and the performer of the action are not necessarily the same, as in I have written a letter, and to intransitive verbs. In the same way the Latin habere, to have, has come to be used as an auxiliary or merely a formative element in the conjugation of the verb in the Romance languages.

havek't, n. A Middle English form of hawk! havek'd (hāv'v'eld), n. [= ODan. havekde = Norw. havella, a sea-duck: see Harelda.] The Icelandic name of the long-tailed duck. See Harelda.

Curreen Musseeh was, I believe, a havildar in the Company's army, and his sword and sash were still hung up, with a not unpleasing vanity, over the desk where he now presided as catechist.

Bp. Heber, Journey through the Upper Provinces [of India], i. 149.

havill, n. See havil.

having (hav'ing), n. [< ME. having; verbal n. of have, v.] 1. The act or state of possessing.

And, having that, do choke their service up
Even with the having. Shak., As You Like It, ii. 3.

2. That which is had or owned; possessions; goods; estate.

But I pardon you for that; for, simply, your having in beard is a younger brother's revenue.
Shak., As You Like It, iii. 2.

Conversation is our account of ourselves. All we have, all we can, all we know, is brought into play, and as the reproduction, in finer form, of all our havings.
Emerson, Woman.

3 (hā'ving). Behavior; conduct; especially, good behavior; good manners; good breeding; now usually in the plural. [Scotch.]

My poor toop-lamb, my son and heir,

Oh, bid him breed him up w' care;

An' if he live to be a beast,

To pit some havins in his breast!

Burns, Death of Poor Mallie.

She is may be four or five years younger than the like o' me;—bye and attour her gentle havings.

Scott, Redgauntlet, letter xii.

having (hav'ing), p. a. [Ppr. of have, v.] Covetous; grasping. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 249.

Martha, more lax on the subject of primogeniture, was sorry to think that Jane was so having.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxxv.

havior, haviourt, n. [Early mod. E. also haveour; by aphesis from behavior, q. v.] Same as behavior.

The men of haviour and honest citizens walked in the market place in their long gowns.

North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 129.

Her heavenly haveour, her princely grace,

Can you well compare? Spenser, Shep. Cal., April.

With the same haviour that your passion bears,

Go on my master's griefs. Shak., T. N., iii. 4.

havoc, havock (hav'ok), n. [Early mod. E. havock, havoek; < ME. havok, hovek, havec, < AS. hafoc, hafuc, a hawk; see hawk.] Of which havoc is the native (AS.) form, as hawk is the Scand. form, havock, commonly havoc (ME. havok), remaining only in the deflected use (def. 2), which arises out of the phrase to cry havoc, that is, to cry "havoc!" "to cry 'hawk!'" appar. orig. a cry of encouragement to a hawk when loosed upon its prey, or a mere cry of excitement or warning at the beginning of the sport. Cf. the exclamation ware the hawk! (Skelton, etc.)] 1. An early Middle English form of hawk, surviving till later times in the phrase to cry havoc.—2. General and relentless destruction.

To goose skepe to all raskall and forlorne persones to make general havock and spoyle of your goods.

Grafton, Queen Mary, an. 1.

And neuer yet did Insurrection want Such water-colours, to impaint his cause:

Nor moody Beggars, staring for a time,
Of pell-mell havock and confusion.

Shak., 1 Ben. IV., v. 1 (folio 1623).

Ye gods! What havock does ambition make

Among your works! Addison, Cato, fi. 1.

To cry havoc or havock. (at) See the etymology. (b) To shout for the beginning or the continuation of a work of indiscriminate destruction or rapine.

And Cæsar's spirit, ranging for revenge,
With Atë by his side, come hot from hell,

Shall in these confines, with a monarch's voice,
Cry Havock, and let slip the dogs of war.

Shak., J. C., iii. 1.

havoc, havock (hav'ok), v. t.; pret. and pp. havocked, ppr. havocking. [< havoc, havock, n.] To work general destruction upon; devastate; destroy; lay waste.

haw² (hā), n. [< ME. hawe, < AS. haga, only in pl. hagan, haws, also appar. as a synonym for things of no value; equiv. to hawberry or hawthorn-berry (cf. MD. haeghesie); no AS. hægberie* occurs. See *haw*¹.] 1. The fruit of the hawthorn, Crataegus Oxyacantha.

In some he lyeth by hawys,
That on hauthorne growth by schawys.

Sir Orpheo (Ritson's Metr. Rom., II.).

2. The fruit of any of the species of Crataegus.
A lane noted for wild roses in summer, for nuts and blackberries in autumn, and even now possessing a few coral treasures in hips and haws.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, XII.

3. The plant which bears such fruit: usually with some qualifying word denoting, for the most part, the character of the fruit. Thus, in America, the apple-haw is Crataegus estivalis; the hog-haw, C. brachycantha; the parsley-haw, C. apifolia; the pear-haw, C. tomentosa; the red or scarlet haw, C. coccinea; the summer haw or yellow haw, C. flava, etc.

4. The Viburnum prunifolium, the black haw of the United States. See Viburnum.—5†. Any berry.

Behold the plants and trees; they produce flowers, haws, and fruit. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 357.

6†. Proverbially, a thing of no value.

Al nas [ne was, was not] wurth an hawse.

Rob. of Gloucester, p. 534.

But al for noght; I sette noght an hawse

Of his proverbes, ne of his olde sawe.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 659.

haw³ (há), n. [ME. haw, an excrescence in the eye; perhaps a particular use of *haw*², a berry.] 1. An excrescence in the eye; specifically, in farriery, a diseased or disordered condition of the third eyelid of a horse; generally in the plural, haws.—2. The third eyelid, nictitating membrane, or winker of a horse.

haw⁴ (há), v. i. [ME. hæwen, found only in comp. behæwen, bihæwen, observe, cf. AS. hæwian (or hæwian ?), intr., look, in comp. ge-hæwian, be-hæwian, tr., look at, observe.] To look; used especially in the imperative, haw! or look haw! to call attention. [Prov. Eng.]

haw⁵ (há), interj. [Appar. orig. the same as *haw*⁴, as used in the imperative to call attention, but in use a var. of ho, whoa, etc., with a specialized meaning.] An exclamation used by a driver to his horses or oxen, to command them to turn to the left. See *haw*⁶, v.

haw⁶ (há), v. [cf. *haw*⁵, interj. Cf. *haw*⁴.] I. intrans. To turn to the left: the opposite of gee: said of horses and cattle.

II. trans. To turn or cause to come to the near side: as, to haw oxen.

haw^{6†} (há), a. [cf. ME. hawe, < AS. hæwen, blue.] Blue; azure.

Thro' and thro' the bonny ship's side,

He saw the green hawe sea.

Sir Patrick Spens (Child's Ballads, III. 341).

haw⁷ (há), interj. [The same as ha as a hesitating utterance; a drawing syllable, much used by unfluent speakers, but usually ignored in writing and print, except in novels, plays, and other writings aiming at verisimilitude of speech; also written, if written at all, huh, and without aspiration aw, ah, uh, ur, er, etc.] An unmeaning syllable marking the pauses of hesitating speech. It takes various vocal forms, variously indicated in writing. See the etymology.

haw⁷ (há), n. [cf. *haw*⁷, interj.] An intermission or hesitation of speech marked by the unmeaning syllable haw.

For if through any hums and haws

There haps an intervening pause. Congreve.

haw⁷ (há), v. i. [cf. *haw*⁷, interj.] To speak with hesitation and the interruption of drawing and unmeaning sounds: as, to haw and haw.

The skill of lying . . . were to be obtained by industry
— You must not hum, nor haw, nor blush for 't.

Steele, Lying Lover, li. 1.

Hawaiian (há-wí'-yan), a. and n. [cf. Hawaii (see def.), a native name, + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the island of Hawaii or the Sandwich Islands, a group of islands in the North Pacific about 2,100 miles west-southwest of San Francisco.

II. n. 1. A native or citizen of Hawaii.—2. The language of Hawaii.

hawane, n. The fruit of the palm Pritchardia Gandchaulit.

hawbuck (há'-buk), n. [Appar. < *haw*¹, hedge, + *buck*².] An unmannerly lout; a clown. [Prov. Eng.]

Bless my heart! excuse me, Sir Richard—to sit down and leave you standing! 'Slife, sir, sorrow is making a hawbuck of me.

Kingley, Westward Ho, v.

hawcubiter (há'-kū-bit), n. [A slang name, combining the equiv. mohawk, q. v., with Jaco- bite, another term exciting public interest at the time mentioned in the def.] One of a band of dissolute young men in London who swaggered about the streets at night during the closing years of the seventeenth century, insulting passers, breaking windows, etc.; a mohawk.

hawebaker, n. [ME.: see def.] A word of uncertain meaning, found only in the following passage. From its apparent form, it is supposed to signify the baked berry of the hawthorn—that is, coarse fare. It appears in the manuscripts sometimes as one word, sometimes as two words.

I recche noght a bene,

Though I come after him with hawebake;

I speke in prose, and let him rymes make.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Man of Law's Tale, l. 95.

hawfinch (há'-finch), n. [cf. *haw*¹ + *finch*¹.] The hawthorn-grosbeak, Coccothraustes vulgaris, a common European fringilline bird, about 6 inches long, with a very stout, turgid bill, the ends of the inner secondaries obliquely curved and truncated, and the plumage much variegated. See also cut under Coccothraustes. The name is extended to sundry related American grosbeaks, as the evening grosbeak, Hesperophona vespertina, the rose-breasted grosbeak, Zamelodia or Habia ludoviciana, etc.

haw-haw¹ (há'-há), interj. [A heavier form of *ha-ha*¹, q. v.] An utterance accompanying loud, coarse laughter.

haw-haw¹ (há'-há), v. i. [cf. *haw-haw*¹, interj.] To laugh loudly and heavily; guffaw.

I sat down in front of the General, and we haw-haw'd,
I tell you, for no more than half an hour.

Seba Smith, Major Downing's Letters, p. 189.

haw-haw¹ (há'-há), n. [cf. *haw-haw*¹, interj.] A guffaw; loud, coarse laughter.

He laughed not very often, and when he did, with a sudden, loud haw-haw, hearty, but somehow joyless, like an echo from a rock.

R. L. Stevenson, Pastoral.

haw-haw² (há'-há), n. Same as *ha-ha*².

hawk¹ (hák), n. [cf. ME. hawk, a contraction (due to Scand. or LG.) of reg. ME. havek, havec, havok (see havoc, havock), < AS. hafoc, hafuc, haufoc = OS. habhok (in comp. proper names) = Fries. hawk = D. havik = MLG. havek, LG. hawek, hawk = OHG. habuch, habich, MHG. habich, habech, hebech, G. habicht = Icel. haukr = Sw. hök = Dan. høg, a hawk; perhaps, with suffix as in Goth. ahaks, a dove, OHG. kranuh, G. kranich, a crane, from the root haf* of AS. hebban, E. heave, in its early sense of 'take,' 'seize,' as in L. capere (cf. L. accipiter, a hawk, usually derived from capere; but see accipiter).] 1. A diurnal bird of prey which does not habitually feed upon carrion: contrasted with owl and with vulture. (a) In a strict technical sense, any species of the subfamily Accipitrinae or either of the genera Accipiter and Accipiter, having rounded wings which extend, when folded, about two thirds the length of the tail; the tail long and square or little rounded; the shank comparatively long and naked or little feathered; and the beak not toothed. Such are the sparrow-hawk, Accipiter nisus of Europe, the European goshawk, Accipiter palumbarius, and many others, found in all parts of the world. They are of medium and small size, the goshawks being among the largest, and prey for the most part on humble quarry, which they capture by chasing or raking after it, not by pouncing upon it. In this sense hawk is contrasted with falcon, eagle, kite, buzzard, etc. See Accipitrinae, and cut under Accipiter. (b) Any diurnal bird of prey of the family Falconidae, including eagles, buzzards, kites, etc. (c) Any bird used in falconry: as, a noble or ignoble hawk. See falcon.

He went on haukynge by the ryver syde

And let his hawkes flee.

Lyttell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 101).

Between two hawks, which flies the higher pitch:

Between two dogs, which hath the deeper mouth; . . .

I have perhaps some shallow spirit of judgment.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 4.

"What colour were his hawks?" she says,

"What colour were his hounds?"

Young Johnstone (Child's Ballads, II. 295).

The wild hawk stood with the down on his beak,

And stared, with his foot on the prey.

Tennyson, The Poet's Song.

2. With a specifying term, some bird that hawks for its prey on the wing. Thus, in the United States, the goatsuckers of the genus Chordeiles are commonly called night-hawks. The night-jar, Caprimulgus europæus, is locally called dor, gnat, moth, night, and screech-hawk; and the swift is sometimes called hawk-swallow. See cut under goatsucker.—Black hawk, the American rough-legged hawk or black buzzard, Archibuteo lagopus sancti-johannis, in its melanistic phase. See cut under Archibuteo.—Hawk's glove. See glove.—Hawk's lure, in her. See lure.—Ignoble hawks, those hawks which have no tooth and rake after the quarry. They are Accipitrines.—Make-hawk, a trained and steady hawk flown with young birds to teach them to take the quarry.—Noble hawks, those hawks which have a toothed beak and plunge down upon or stoop to the quarry, as any falcon; the Falconinae.—Passage hawk, a hawk captured when on its migration. See peregrine.—Red hawk, in falconry, a hawk of the first year, in its young plumage.—Sharp-shinned hawk, the American Accipiter fuscus, a small true hawk with extremely slender shanks, corresponding to that which is called sparrow-hawk in England. [U. S.]—To know a hawk from a hand-saw. See hand-saw. (See also fish-hawk, hen-hawk, marsh-hawk, pigeon-hawk, singing-hawk, sparrow-hawk, squirrel-hawk.)—Syn. Hawk, Falcon. Hawk is the most general and indefinite name of a bird of prey. It seems to have at first distinguished the birds so designated from carrion-feeding kinds and from those that prey by night (vultures and owls), and then to have been applied to those which could be trained—that is, used in the sport of hawking or falconry. Its nearest synonym is falcon; and since all hawks were formerly placed in one genus, Falco, hawk and falcon became interchangeable book-names for most members of the family Falconidae. But, again, the hawk used in falconry were of two series, respectively designated noble and ignoble, corresponding to two technical subfamilies of Falconidae. The name falcon became, therefore, technically restricted to the former of these series, the subfamily Falconinae, while hawk was coincidentally applied to the other, Accipitrinae, alone.

hawk¹ (hák), v. i. [cf. *hawk*¹, n.] 1. To hunt birds or small animals by means of hawks or falcons trained for the purpose; practise hawking; engage in falconry.

A little river . . . much frequented by fowle, and rigorously preserved for the Grand Signiors pleasure; who ordinarily hawks thereon.

Sandys, Travels, p. 29.

An man have not skill in the hawking and hunting languages now a dayes, I'll not give a rush for him.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 1.

2. To fly in the manner of the hawk; soar; take prey in the air.

Now hawks aloft, now skims along the flood.

Dryden.

When the swallows are seen hawking very high, it is a good indication; the insects upon which they feed venture up there only in the most auspicious weather.

J. Burroughs, The Century, XXV. 675.

To hawk at, to fly at; attack on the wing.

Lord L. 'Tis my wonder

Two animals should hawk at all discourse thus.

B. Jonson, New Inn, ii. 2.

I had rather see a wren hawk at a fly,

Than this decision.

Fletcher and another, Two Noble Kinsmen, v. 3.

hawk² (hák), v. t. [Due to the older noun, *hawker*², q. v.; so peddle, from peddler. Cf. *hawk*².] To offer for sale by outery in a street or other public place, or from door to door; convey through town or country for sale: as, to hawk brooms or ballads.

His works were hawked in every street.

Swift.

Thou goest still amongst them, seeing if, peradventure, thou canst hawk a volume or two.

Lamb, All Fools' Day.

I hear thee not at all, or hoarse

As when a hawk hawks his wares.

Tennyson, The Blackbird.

I come not of the race

That hawk their sorrows in the market-place.

Lowell, To my Fire.

hawk³ (hák), v. [Formerly also hawk; imitative, like Dan. hærke, Sw. harka, W. hochi, hawk. Cf. also cough, and words there cited.] I. intrans. To make an effort to raise phlegm from the throat.

Touch. Come, sit, sit, and a song. . .
I Page. Shall we clap into 't roundly, without hawking, or spitting, or saying we are hoarse?

Shak., As you Like it, v. 3.

If he shou'd come before I wou'd have him, I'll come before him, and cough and hawk soundly, that you may not be surpriz'd.

Wycherley, Gentleman Dancing-Master, v. 1.

II. trans. To raise by hawking: as, to hawk up phlegm.

hawk³ (hák), n. [cf. *hawk*³, v.] An effort to raise phlegm from the throat.

hawk-bell (hák'-bel), n. A small bell made to be attached to the leg of a hawk: used in falconry. These bells are of the form of a sleigh-bell, and are fastened on the hawk by the varvels or rings.

hawkbill (hák'-bil), n. 1. The carapace, or hawk-billed sea-turtle, Eretmochelys imbricata. It is from this turtle that tortoise-shell is obtained. Also called hawk's-bill. See cut under Eretmochelys.—2. A pair of pliers with curved nose, used to hold pieces in soldering them with a blowpipe.

hawk-billed (hák'bîld), a. Having a bill or beak like or likened to a hawk's: as, a hawk-billed turtle.

hawk-bit (hák'bit), n. A plant of the genus Leontodon, natural order Compositæ, related to the hawkweed and dandelion. The best-known species is L. autumnale, called the fall dandelion, which has become naturalized in the United States from Europe. (See Leontodon.) The name has also been improperly applied to the species of Hieracium, in place of hawkweed.

hawk-boy (hák'boy), n. An assistant to a plasterer, who supplies him with plaster or mortar, placing it upon the hawk.

hawk-eagle (hák'ē'gl), n. A bird of the genus Spizæus; one of certain crested hawks. There are numerous species, the most typical of which are South American, as S. ornatus, S. bellicosus, etc.

hawked (hák't), a. Crooked; curving like a hawk's bill.

Flat noses seem comely unto the Moor, an aquiline or hawked one unto the Persians.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 11.
hawker¹ (há'kér), n. [ME. hawkere*, < AS. hafaere (once) (= MLG. heveker), a hawker, falconer, < hafoc, hafec, hawk: see *hawk*¹ and -er.] 1. One who hawks, or pursues the sport of hawking; a falconer.

Hawkers and hunters, drunkards, . . . having no other god but their belly. Harman, tr. of Beza's Sermons, p. 334.

2. [Cf. yacht, lit. a chaser, hunter (strictly a chase, hunt).] A sloop-rigged vessel.

hawker² (há'kér), n. [Also dial. hocker; < D. heuker = G. hocker, höcker, a retailer, = Dan. höker, a huckster, chandler, = Sw. hökare, a chandler, cheesemonger: see further under huckster.] One who offers goods for sale by out-cry in the street; one who travels about selling small wares; a peddler; a packman.

We must be teased with perpetual hawkers of strange and wonderful things. Swift, Bickerstaff Papers.

The hawkers who cried Tory pamphlets and broadsides through the streets were at once sent to the House of Correction. Lucky, Eng. in 18th Cent., ii.

hawker² (há'kér), v. t. [*hawker*², n.] To play the hawker; peddle. [Rare.]

But was implacable and awkward
To all that interloped and hawked.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. iii. 620.

hawkey¹ (há'ki), n. Same as *hockey*¹.

hawkey² (há'ki), n. Same as *hockey*².

hawkey³, hawkie (há'ki), n. [Sc. cf. hawkit, white-faced, as a cow, also stupid; origin obscure.] 1. A cow; specifically, a black and white cow; more especially, a cow of a dark color with a white stripe on the face.

The soupe their only hawkie does afford,
That 'yont the hallan snugly chows her end.
Burns, Cottar's Saturday Night.

2. A stupid fellow; a clown.

Hawkeye (hák'ī), n. An inhabitant or a native of the State of Iowa, which is popularly called the "Hawkeye State": said to be so called from the name of an Indian chief who once lived in that region. [Colloq., U. S.]

hawk-eyed (hák'id), a. Having acute vision, like that of a hawk; having bold, piercing eyes.

He entered through a dim door-way, and saw a hawk-eyed woman, rough-headed and unwashed, cheapening a hungry girl's last bit of finery.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xix.

hawk-fly (hák'fi), n. A dipterous insect of the family Asilidæ; one of numerous hornet-peds by means of trained birds of the falcon kind, generically called hawks; falconry.

Dost thou love hawking? thou hast hawks will soar

hawking-glove (há'king-glúv), n. A glove used in falconry, especially that worn on the left hand, upon which the hawk is carried, and which protects the hand from the claws of the bird.

hawking-pole (há'king-pól), n. A staff used in falconry.

Now during that ninth year . . . these canes prove so bigge and strong withall that they serve for hawking-poles, and fowlers perches. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xvi. 36.

hawking-pouch (há'king-pouch), n. A bag or almoner worn by a falconer, or by a man or woman engaged in the sport of hawking. They were large enough to serve upon occasion as game-bags, but much of their space was taken up with little pockets to contain the bells, jesses, lure, and other requisites for hawking.

hawkish (há'kish), a. [*hawk*¹ + -ish.] Pertaining to or resembling a hawk; rapacious; fierce.

My learned friends! most swift and sharp are you; of temper most accipitral, hawkish, aquiline.
Carlyle, Misc., IV. 245.

She must have been very beautiful as a young girl, but was now too fierce and hawkish looking.

H. Kingsley, Geoffrey Hamlyn, vi.

hawkit (há'kit), a. [Sc.: see *hawkey*³.] 1. Having a white face: applied to cattle.

Hawk-moth (Protoparce carolina), one half natural size.

or sphinx: so called from the mode of flight, which is likened to the hovering or "wind-hovering" of a hawk. The species are numerous, and are referred to several modern families and many genera.—Death's-head hawk-moth. See death's-head.—Elephant hawk-moth, a name of the Metopius elycon.—Humming-bird hawk-moth, Macroglossa stellatarum, one of the most beautiful of the diurnal species of hawk-moths, and remarkable for the loudness of the sound which its wings produce. When feeding it inserts its long proboscis into the cups of even the narrowest tubular flowers.—Small elephant hawk-moth, Metopius procellus.

hawk-nosed (hák'nôzd), a. Having a nose resembling the beak of a hawk.

hawknut (hák'nút), n. A tuber of an umbelliferous plant, Conopodium denudatum (Bunium flexuosum), a native of western Europe and the British isles; also, the plant itself. The tubers are aromatic and sweetish, though somewhat acrid when raw; when boiled or roasted they become quite palatable, and resemble chestnuts in taste, whence they are called earth-chestnuts. Several other names are applied to them, such as earthnut, hognut, pignut, and kipper-nut.

hawk-owl (hák'oul), n. 1. The day-owl, Surnia ulula or Ulua funerea: so called from its diurnal habits and notable rapacity. It is a rather small owl, without plumicorns, with the facial disk very imperfect, the tail long and graduated, and the plumage barred throughout. It inhabits the northern parts of Europe, Asia, and America.

2. The short-eared owl, Strix brachyotus or Asio accipitrinus.—3. The harfang or great snowy owl, Nyctea nivea.

hawk-parrot (hák'par'ot), n. A parrot of the genus Deroptyus, as D. coronatus or accipitrinus, the crested hawk-parrot of the Amazon. See cut under Deroptyus.

hawk's-beard (haks'bêrd), n. A plant of the genus Crepis, allied to the hawkweeds and the dandelion. A few species, as Crepis rubra, are cultivated. See Crepis.

That is hawme-legged, legges turned outward, as some say, that hath a pair of left legges, [L.] valgus.

Withals, Dict. (ed. 1608), p. 286.

hawse¹ (hâz), n. [Earlier spelling halse: see *halse*².] 1. That part of a vessel's bow where the holes for her cables to pass through are cut: now used chiefly in phrases describing the condition of a vessel's chains when she is moored with both starboard and port anchors down. Thus, the hawse is clear when both chains lead direct to their respective anchors; when the ship brings a strain on both chains, one on each bow, the hawse is said to be open, and if the chains are crossed or twisted together, the hawse is said to be foul.

2. The space between the ship and her anchors: as, he was anchored in our hawse; the brig fell foul of our hawse, etc.

"There are mischief-makers behind." "Ay? just you tell me who they are; I'll teach them to come across my hawse."
C. Reade, Love me Little, ix.

"Sail ho!" was cried again, and we made another sail, broad on our weather bow, and steering athwart our hawse.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 18.

Athwart hawse. See athwart.—Cross in the hawse. See *cross*¹, n.—Elbow in the hawse. See elbow.—To freshen the hawse, to veer out or heave in a short length of cable (a few feet) in order that a new portion may receive the chafe of the hawse-pipe: an expression formerly employed when hemp cables were in use.—To moor with an open hawse, to lay out the anchors in a line at right angles with the prevailing wind.

hawse², v. t. [Early mod. E., also written halse; < OF. hauiser, hausser, raise, heave up, lift up, advance, earlier OF. haucer, haucier, haucher, F. hausser, raise, lift, = Fr. ausar, alzar = Sp. alzar, raise, lift, etc. (alzar velas, set the sails), = It. alzare, raise, lift, etc. (alzare le vele, set the sails), < L. as if altiare*, < altus, high: see *haut*¹, alt, altitude, etc.; and cf. hausse. In the naut. sense (in quot. from Grafton), referred by some to Ice. halsa (segl), 'clue up' (a sail) (see *halse*²), but this is a different thing from 'hoisting' sail, for which the Ice. terms are vinda, draga, sefja upp (segl), etc. Not connected with hoise or hoist, q. v.] To raise.

Every thing was hawsed above the measure; amercuities were turned into fines, fines into ransoms.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 62.
He wayed vp his ancors, and halsed vp his sayles.
Grafton, Chron. Rich. III., an. 3.

hawse², n. [ME.; cf. *hawse*², v.] Exaltation.

Alwais to labour that iourney,
Puttyng my hole hert, strength, mynde, and thought ay
To your honour, hawse, and encrease also.
Item, of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), i. 498.

hawse³ (hâz), n. A Scotch form of *halse*¹.

Hawk-fly, or Missouri Bee-killer (Proctacanthus milberti), natural size.

flies or robber-flies: so called from their predaceous habits and swiftness of flight. The adults prey on other insects and are on the whole beneficial, but some species destroy honey-bees. The larvae live underground and are probably phytophagous. Proctacanthus milberti is the Missouri bee-killer; it also preys on the Rocky Mountain locust and the cotton-worm.

hawkie, n. See *hawkey*³.

hawking (há'king), n. [Verbal n. of *hawk*¹, v.] The sport of capturing birds and small quadrupeds Hawk-owl (Surnia ulula).

hawse-hook (hâz'hûk), n. Naut., a breast-hook which crosses the hawse-timber above the upper deck.

hawse-piece (hâz'pēs), n. One of the foremost timbers of a ship through which a hawse-hole passes.

hawse-pipe (hâz'pîp), n. An iron pipe fitted into a hawse-hole to prevent the wood from being abraded.—Hawse-pipe bottom, a sea-bottom of clay or soft rock perforated by worms or other marine animals. Also called honeycomb bottom.

hawse-plug (hâz'plûg), n. A block of wood driven into a ship's hawse-pipe at sea, to prevent the ingress of water. Also called hawse-block.

hawser (hâz'zér), n. [Formerly written halsér, hauiser, halsier (as also halse); < OF. hause-ree, < hauiser, hausser, raise, lift, the E. hawser being practically from the corresponding E. verb hawsen, q. v. The sense suggests a connection with E. haul, hale!; but this cannot be made out.] Naut., a cable; especially, a small cable, or a large rope in size between a cable and a tow-line, used in warping, etc.

Within, the waves in softer murmurs glide,
And ships secure without their hawsers ride.
Pope, Odyssey, xiii.

The anchor, slipp'd at need
With hawsers huge, abates their fearful speed.
Hooke, tr. of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, xix.

The friction of the hawsers was so great as nearly to cut through the bitheads, and, ultimately, to set them on fire.
Parry, Admiral Parry, p. 148.

hawser-laid (hâz'zér-lâd), a. Made of three small ropes laid up into one, as, formerly, small running rigging, shrouds, etc., or, now, cables and tow-lines.

hawse-timber (hâz'tim'bér), n. Naut., one of the upright timbers in the bow, bolted on each side of the stem, in which the hawse-holes are cut.

hawse-wood (hâz'wûd), n. Naut., a general name for the hawse-timbers.

hawsing-iron (hâ'zing-i'érn), n. A chisel used in calking.

hawsom†, n. [G. hawsen, sturgeon: see hawsen.] A sturgeon.

They say that the hawsom fish in the Danube has been taken twenty-one feet in length.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. [251.]

hawthorn (hâ'thörn), n. [ME. hawe-thorn, haz-thorn, < AS. hæthorn, < ONorth. haga-

Hawthorn (Crataegus oxyacantha).

a, b, branches with flowers and fruit; c, d, flower and fruit on larger scale; e, leaf.

thorn (= D. haagdoorn = MHG. hagedorn, G. hagedorn, hagdorn, hagdorn = Icel. hagthorn = Sw. Norw. hagtorn), < AS. haga, E. haw, a hedged inclosure, + thorn, thorn: see haw! and thorn. Cf. haythorn. Hence the proper name Hawthorn, Hawthorne, Hathorn.] A thorny shrub or small tree, Crataegus oxyacantha, much used in hedges. It is found in the wild state throughout most of Europe, in northern Africa, and western Asia. It has been introduced into the United States: a hedge was planted with it by George Washington at Mount Vernon. It has stiff branches bearing strong thorns and deeply lobed or cut leaves. The fruit is the haw. The name is also applied to the genus Crataegus in general. See Crataegus. Also hathorn, haythorn, and hedge-thorn.

The hawthorn whitens; and the juicy groves
Put forth their buds. Thomson, Spring, l. 90.

The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age and whispering lovers made.
Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 13.

Hawthorn china, a kind of Oriental porcelain usually classed as Chinese, though asserted by some to be from Japan. The decoration represents the flowering branches of a plum-tree without the leaves, reserved in white, the ground of dark blue being filled in around it.—Hawthorn pattern. (a) A common decoration of Bow porcelain. (b) A decorative pattern used in some Oriental wares. See Hawthorn china.

hawthorn-grosbeak (hâ'thörn-grôs'bèk), n. The hawfinch.

hawthorn-tree (hâ'thörn-tré), n. Same as hawthorn.

It was a maide of my countrie,
As she came by a hathorne-tree,
As full of flowers as might be seen,
She merveld to see the tree so grene.
The Hawthorn Tree (Child's Ballads, I. 312).

hay¹ (hâ), v. i. [ME. hay, hey, heig, hay, also growing grass, < AS. hig, ONorth. heg, heig, hoeg, hay, also growing grass, = D. hooi = OHG. hevi, houwe, MHG. hōu, hou, houwe, G. heu (hay, obs.) = Icel. hey = Sw. Dan. hō, hay, = Goth. hawi, hay, grass; prob. orig. grass cut or to be cut, < AS. hēdwan, E. hew, etc., cut: see hew!.] Grass that has been cut; especially, grass cut and dried for use as fodder.

He smote the stede, and rode in a monge hem, and made of hem soche martire that thei lay vpon hepes in the feilde, as hey in a medowe. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 199.

Make us a bed o' green rushes,
And cover it o'er w' green hay.
Lizzie Lindsay (Child's Ballads, IV. 71).

When merry milkmaids click the latch,
And rarely smells the new-mown hay.
Tennyson, The Owl.

Between hay and grass, too late for one thing or source of supply, and too soon for another. [Colla, U. S.]—Camel's hay. Same as camel-grass.—Neither hay nor grass, not exactly one thing or the other. [Colla, U. S.]—Tame hay, hay made usually from foreign grasses, such as timothy, or from other forage-plants, as clover, lucerne, etc., which have been specially sown in meadows for the purpose. [Western U. S.]—To look for a needle in a bottle of hay. See bottle!—To make hay. (a) To cut and cure grass for fodder.

He assisted the farmers occasionally in the lighter labors of their farms; helped to make hay; mended the fences; took the horses to water. Irving, Sleepy Hollow.

(b) To throw things into confusion; to scatter everything about in disorder.

O, father, how you are making hay of my things!
Miss Edgeworth, Rose, Thistle, and Shamrock, l. 2.

Furniture, crockery, fender, fire-irons lay in one vast heap of broken confusion in the corner of the room. . . . The fellows were mad with fighting too. I wish they hadn't come here and made hay afterwards.
H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, vii.

To make hay while the sun shines, to seize the favorable opportunity, as must be done with reference to sunshine in hay-making.—Wild hay, hay made from the native or indigenous grasses of any country. [Western U. S.] hay¹ (hâ), v. [ME. hay, hey, < AS. hege, a hedge, fence, < haga, a hedge, > E. haw!; see haw! and hedge.] 1. A hedge.

As fast I bisiede and wolde fayne
Have passed the hay, if I myght
Have gotten ynn. Rom. of the Rose, l. 2971.

Thise holtis and theise hayis,
That han in wynter dede ben and drye, Revesten hem in greene, when that May is.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 351.

2. A net set round the haunt of an animal.

It were not meet to send a huntsman out Into the woods with net, with gin or hay.
John Denny, Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 164.

Subsequently, in 1503, a penalty of the same amount was imposed upon any person keeping deer hays, or buckstalls, unless he had a park, chase, or forest.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 271.

3. An inclosure; a haw.—4. [Cf. heydeguy.] A round country-dance; a dance in a ring.

Hayes, jiggs, and roundelays.
Martin's Month's Minds (1589). (Halliwell.)

With their winding hays,
Active and antic dances, to delight
Your frolic eyes.

Chapman, Widow's Tears, iv. 1.

To dance the hay, to dance in a ring; to tease, to move about briskly.

Shall we goe dance the hay?
Never pipe could ever play
Better shepherd a roundelay.
England's Helicon, p. 228. (Halliwell.)

I will play on the tabor to the worthies, and let them dance the hay.

Mary is busied about many things, is dancing the hays between three houses.
Walpole, Letters, II. 122.

hay² (hâ), v. i. [ME. hay, hey, < AS. hege, a hedge, fence, < haga, a hedge, > E. haw!; see haw! and hedge.] 1. A hedge.

Prithce, content thyself.

We shall scout here, as though we went a-haying.
Beau., and Fl., Coxcomb, i. 3.

hay³ (hâ), interj. Same as hey!.

hay⁴ (hâ). [It. hai, you have it, 2d pers. sing. pres. ind. of avere, < L. habere, have: see habiti, have. Cf. L. habet, he has it, an exclamation used when a gladiator was wounded.] In fencing: (a) An exclamation used when one's opponent is hit.

O, it must be done like lightning, hay!
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 5.

(b) A home thrust.
He fights as you sing prick-song, keeps time, distance, and proportion. . . . Ah, the immortal passado! the puncto reverso! the hay!
Shak., R. and J., II. 4.

haya (hâ'yâ), n. [African.] An arrow-poison used on the western coast of Africa. It seems to have a local analgesic effect, somewhat like that of cocaine, when absorbed from a mucous surface or injected hypodermically. There is evidence that its action depends at least in part upon the presence in it of the bark or other parts of Erythrophloeum guineense.

hay-asthma (hâ'ast'mâ), n. Same as hay-fever.

I escaped from the hay-asthma with a visit of one month.
Southey, Letters.

hay-bacillus (hâ'ba-sil'us), n. Bacillus subtilis: so called because it is abundantly obtained from infusions of hay. See Bacillus, 3.

hay-band (hâ'band), n. A band with which a bundle of hay is bound.

hay-bird (hâ'bêrd), n. 1. A small bird, as a warbler or flycatcher, which uses hay in building its nest. The name is variously applied, as to the whitethroat, Sylvia cinerea, the European blackcap, S. atricapilla, and other species of the same genus in its most restricted sense; to the willow-warbler, Phylloscopus trochilus, the wood-warbler, P. sibilatrix, and chiff-chaff, P. rufus; to the spotted flycatcher, Muscicapa griola, etc. [Eng.]

2. The pectoral sandpiper, or grass-snipe, Tringa maculata. [New Jersey, U. S.]

haybote (hâ'bôt), n. [ME. haybôt, hedge, + boot, E. bote, fine, reparation.] In Eng. law: (a) A fine for damaging or breaking fences. (b) Formerly, an allowance of wood to a tenant for repairing hedges or fences; hedgebote.

hay-cap (hâ'kap), n. A canvas cover or hood placed over a cock of hay to protect it from rain.

hay-car (hâ'kâr), n. On American railroads, a box-car for carrying baled hay. Car-Builders' Dict.

hay-cart (hâ'kârt), n. A hay-wagon or -wain.

We met, however, with great numbers of travellers, mostly farmers with laden hay-carts.

B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 412.

haycock (hâ'kok), n. A small conical pile or heap of hay thrown up in a hay-field while the hay is being cured or is awaiting removal to a barn.

If the earlier season lead
To the tann'd haycock in the mead.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 90.

As they rake the green-appearing ground,
And drive the dusky wave along the mead,
The russet hay-cock rises thick behind,
In order gay. Thomson, Summer, l. 367.

hay-cold (hâ'kôld), n. Same as hay-fever.

hay-cromet, n. A hay-rake. Davies.

They fell downe on their mary-bones, and lift up their hay-cromes unto him.
Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 166).

hay-cutter (hâ'kut'ér), n. A machine for cutting hay into small pieces for use as food for cattle.

haydeguyet, haydegeet, etc., n. See heyday-guise.

haydenite (hā'dn-īt), n. [Named after Dr. H. H. Hayden (1769–1844), a dentist, who discovered it near Baltimore in Maryland.] A variety of the zeolite chabazite.

hay-elevator (hā'el'ē-vā-tor), n. A mechanical hay-fork or hay-lifting and -conveying apparatus, used to lift a quantity of hay from a wagon and place it in a loft.

hayesin (hā'zīn), n. [Named after A. A. Hayes (1806–82), an American chemist.] A hydrous calcium borate related to ulexite.

hay-fever (hā'fē'vēr), n. A feverish attack, coming on in the summer, with inflammation of the mucous membrane of the nose and eyes, or conjunctivitis, bronchitis, and asthma, and caused by the pollen of various plants, especially of the ragweed. Also called summer fever, summer catarrh, hay-cold, hay-asthma, autumnal catarrh, pollen-fever, pollen-catarrh, and (early forms) rose-cold and June cold.

hay-field (hā'fēld), n. A field where grass designed to be made into hay is grown; a field where grass is being made into hay.

There from the sun-burnt hayfield homeward creeps
The loaded wain. Couper, Task, I, 295.

hay-fork (hā'fōrk), n. A fork used for turning over hay to dry, or in lifting it, as into a cart, on to a rick, etc.

hay-hook (hā'hūk), n. 1. A hand-tool for pulling hay from the side of a stack or mow.—2. In her, a rare bearing representing a large hook with a sort of square socket at the upper end. The point is sometimes finished with a head, as of a dog.

haying (hā'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *hay*¹, v.] The process of making hay; the work of cutting, curing, and storing grass.

hay-jack (hā'jak), n. A name of several warblers, as of species of Sylvia and Phylloscopus, which build nests of hay; a hay-bird. [Local, Eng.]

This style of nest-building [with the sides and bottom like open basketwork] seems to be common to all the species of the genus Sylvia, as now restricted, and in many districts has obtained for the builders the name of Hay-Jack, quite without reference to the kind of bird which puts the nests together. Enycy. Brit., XXIV, 558.

Black-headed hay-jack, Sylvia atricapilla, the black-cap.

hay-knife (hā'nīf), n. A long knife with the blade set at right angles to the handle, or a spade-like cutting-tool with a blade, foot-rest, and curved handle, used to cut hay from the side of a haystack or haymow.

hay-loader (hā'lō'dēr), n. A device attached to a hay-rack or hay-wagon, for gathering up the hay from windrows or from haycocks and loading it upon the wagon. The most simple form is a crane fastened to the body of a wagon, and having a large hay-fork suspended from its arm. A more complicated machine includes a hay-rake trailing behind the wagon, and an elevator for raising the hay gathered by the rake and depositing it upon the wagon.

hay-loft (hā'lōft), n. In a stable or barn, a storing-place for hay.

hay-maiden, hay-maids (hā'mā'dn, -mādz), n. [In poet. allusion to girls in the hay-field.] The ground-ivy, Nepeta Glechoma. [Eng.]

haymaker (hā'mā'kēr), n. 1. One who cuts and dries grass for use as fodder; specifically, in England, one who follows the mowers and tosses the grass over to dry it.

The conversation turned commonly on the incidents of the summer; how the hay-makers overtook the mowers, or how the rain kept the labour back.

Hone's Year Book, Oct. 8.
2. An apparatus for drying and curing hay. It consists of a long inclined shoot, through which fresh-cut grass is passed by means of a conveyer, and in which it meets a volume of hot air from a coke-furnace. It resembles the more simple fruit-driers.

3. pl. A kind of country-dance. Also called haymakers' jig.

hay-market (hā'mār'ket), n. A place for the sale of hay.

haymow (hā'mou), n. A mow or mass of hay stored in a barn.

haymslynst, n. pl. See hanselines.

hay-plant (hā'plant), n. An umbelliferous plant, Prangos pabularia, which grows in Tibet and adjacent mountainous countries, and is there highly valued as a forage-plant. Its value was first made known to Europeans by Moorcroft, and attempts have been made to introduce it into Europe, but generally without success. It has been thought to be the "Siphium" mentioned by Arrian in his account of the wars of Alexander the Great.

hay-press (hā'pres), n. A press for making loose hay into bales for convenience of storage and transportation; a baling-press.

hayz (hā'iz), n. [Ar.] In *astro*l., an accidental fortune, consisting in the situation of a masculine diurnal planet in a masculine sign above the horizon in the daytime, or of a feminine nocturnal planet in a feminine sign below the horizon in the night-time. The planet is properly said to be in its own hayz or running-place.

hazard (haz'ārd), n. [Formerly also hazard; < ME. hasard, hazard, a game of chance, < OF. hasard, hazard, a game at dice, the six at dice, adventure, F. hasard, hazard, = Olt. zara, a game at dice, also a hazard or a nick at dice, lt. (after F.) azzardo, hazard, risk, danger, < Sp. azar, an unforeseen disaster, unexpected accident, an unfortunate card or throw at dice, hazard, formerly also the ace at dice, = Pg. azar, ill luck, a cast at dice losing all; orig. a die, < Ar. al-zār, the die, < al, the, + zār (in vulgar speech), a die (Devic), < Pers. zār, die (Zenker). Mahn, in Webster, gives Ar. shār, sār, a die, < sahara, be white, shine (cf. Ar. shar, dawn of day f.).] 1. The leading game at dice. The instruments are a box and two dice. The players are a caster and any number of setters. The setter stakes his money upon the table: the caster accepts the bet if he chooses, and must cover the setter's money if required. The setter can bar any throw. The caster first calls a main—that is, he calls any of the numbers 6, 7, 8, or 9. He then throws his chance. If this is 2, 3, 11, or 12, it is called crabs and he loses, unless the main were 7 and he throws 11, or the main were 6 or 8 and he throws 12. In these cases, and also if he throws the main, his throw is called nick, and he wins. If he throws neither crabs nor nick, he must continue to throw until he again throws the main or his chance; if he throws the former first, the setter wins, if the latter the caster wins. Owing to the complicated chances, a good player at hazard has a great advantage over a novice.

In Flanders whylome was a compaignye

Of yonge folk that haunted folys

As ryot, hazard, stewes and tavernes.

Chaucer, Pardoner's Tale, l. 3.

Early at business, and at hazard late;

Mad at a fox-chase, wise at a debate,

Pope, Moral Essays, i. 73.

2. A fortuitous event; chance; accident.

I will stand the hazard of the die.

Shak., Rich. III., v. 4.

Fortune

(The blind foe to all beauty that is good)

Banded you from one hazard to another.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, v. 1.

Two plants taken at hazard were protected under separate nets. Darwin, Cross and Self Fertilisation, p. 339.

3. Risk; peril; exposure to danger; liability to do or to receive harm: as, the hazards of the sea; he did it at the hazard of his reputation.

But Fame said, take heed how you loose me, for if you do, you will run a great hazard never to meet me again, there's no retrieving of me. Howell, Letters, ii. 14.

The tragedies of former times,

Hazards and strange escapes.

Wordsworth, Prelude, viii.

4. One of the holes in the sides of a billiard-table. Bailey, 1731. Hence—5. A stroke in billiards: known as losing hazard when the player pockets his own ball off another, and as winning hazard when he pockets the object-ball. [Eng.]

The object of the player . . . is to drive one or other of the balls in one or other of the pockets. . . . [This stroke] is known as a hazard. Enycy. Brit., III, 675.

6. Something risked or staked.

I do not doubt . . .
To . . . bring your latter hazard back again.
Shak., M. of V., i. 1.

7. In tennis and some similar games, that side of the court into which the ball is served. See tennis.

Another when at the racket court he had a ball struck into his hazard, he would ever and anon cry out, Estes vous la avec vous ours? Hovell, Foraine Travell (1642), §3.

When we have match'd our rackets to these balls,

We will in France, by God's grace, play a set

Shall strike his father's crown into the hazard.

Shak., Hen. V., i. 2.

8. In golf, a bunker, long grass, or other piece of bad ground.—Chicken hazard, a game of chance with very small stakes.—To run the hazard, to do something when the consequences are not foreseen and not within the powers of calculation; risk; take the chance. = Syn. Venture, etc. See risk, n.

hazard (haz'ard), v. [= F. hasarder, venture; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To take the chance of; venture to do, undertake, etc.

A cunning thief . . . would hazard the winning both of first and last.
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 5.

Mr. Darcy would never have hazarded such a proposal, if he had not been well assured of his cousin's corroboration.
Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, p. 177.

2. To take the risk or danger of; run the risk of incurring or bringing to pass; as, to hazard the loss of reputation or of a battle.

I know that by telling it I hazard a mortal enmity.
Theodore Parker, Historic Americans.

3. To imperil; expose to danger or loss: as, to hazard life for a friend; to hazard an estate recklessly.

I hold it better far
To keep the course we run, than, seeking change,
Hazard our lives, our heirs, and the realms.
Webster and Dekker, Sir Thomas Wyatt, p. 18.

4. To incur the danger involved in; venture.

I must hazard the production of the bald fact, . . . though it should prove an Egyptian skull at our banquet.
Emerson, Friendship.

5. To expose to the risk of; put in danger of: with to. [Rare.]

He hazards his neck to the halter.
Fuller.
= Syn. To jeopard, peril, imperil, endanger. See danger, and risk, n.

II. intrans. To try the chance; adventure; run the risk or danger.

Yet you may scape to the camp; we'll hazard with you.
Fletcher, Valentinian, iv. 4.

Pause a day or two Before you hazard.
Shak., M. of V., iii. 2.

hazardable (haz'ard-a-bl), a. [< hazard + -able.] 1. Liable to hazard or chance; exposed to danger.

How to keep the corps seven dayes from corruption by anointing and washing, without exenteration, were an hazardable peece of art, in our choisest practise.
Sir T. Browne, Urn-Burial, iii.

For Cooper's Dictionary, I will send it you as soon as I can; but it is so difficult and hazardable . . . as I cannot tell how to convey that, or anything else to thee.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, i. 410.

2. Capable of being hazarded or risked.

hazarder (haz'ard-er), n. [Early mod. E. also hasardour; < ME. hasardour, < OF. hasardour, hasardeur, < hasard, hazard: see hazard, n.] A player at dice or cards; a gamester.

Spenser, F. Q., II. v. 13.

hazard-table (haz'ard-tā'bl), n. A table at which games of chance are played, especially with dice.

haze¹ (hāz), n. [Formerly also hase; the earliest instances (namely, of haze, v., and hazy, a.: see quot.) are of the latter part of the 17th century. Origin unknown; there is nothing to connect the word with AS. hasu, haso, gray (applied to the dove, eagle, wolf, to smoke, to garments, etc., but not to the weather), = Ice. höss, gray (applied to the eagle, wolf, the hair of the head, etc., but not to the weather).] The aggregation of a countless multitude of extremely minute and even ultra-microscopic particles in the air, individually invisible, but producing in the aggregate an opaqueness of the atmosphere. Unlike fog, haze is commonly observed when the lower air is in a state of unusual dryness, sometimes appearing in horizontal strata at an average altitude of about 1,500 feet, and again often diffused through the air up to a much greater height and having no definite locus. In the common form that occurs when the upper air is in a state of incipient cloudiness, the particles are very minute droplets of water with or without an admixture of smoke or dust; in other cases, the particles consist of organic or inorganic matter carried to high altitudes by convective and other ascending currents. The former has been termed water-haze, and usually appears gray or bluish in reflected light, and yellow, orange, or red in transmitted light; the latter is called dust-haze, and may be distinguished by its buff tint. = Syn. Mist, Fog, etc. See rain, n.

haze² (hāz), v. i.; pret. and pp. hazed, ppr. hazing. [< haze¹, n.] 1†. To drizzle.

It hazes, it misles, or rains small rain.

Ray, Collection of North. Eng. Words (ed. 1691).

2. To be or become foggy or hazy. [Rare.]
haze² (hāz), v.; pret. and pp. hazed, ppr. hazing. [Formerly also hase; < OF. haser, irritate, vex, annoy, insult (Godefroy.)] I. trans. 1. To harass with labor; punish with unnecessary work, as a seaman.

Every shifting of the studding-sails was only to haze the crew.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 50.

2. To play mischievous or abusive tricks on; try the pluck or temper of, especially by physical persecution, as lower-class students in a college or new-comers in an establishment of any kind.

'Tis the Sophomores rushing the Freshmen to haze.
Poem before Iadma, quoted in College Words, p. 251.

II. intrans. To frolic; lark. [Colloq., U.S.]
Hazin' round with Charity Bunker and the rest of the gals.
Wise, Tales for the Marines.

hazeck (hā'zek), n. Same as haysuck. [Prov. Eng.]

hazel (hā'zl), n. and a. [Also hazle, early mod. E. hasel, hasil, < ME. hasel, hesil, < AS. hæsel = D. hazel (aar) = OHG. hasala, f., hasal, m., MHG. G. hasel, f., = Ice. hasl, m., hesli, n., = Sw.

Dan. hassel = L. corulus, corylus (for cosulus*) = W. coll, hazel. The form suggests a connection with hare†, OHG. haso, G. hase; but this is uncertain.] I. n. A plant of the genus Corylus, shrubs or small trees belonging to the natural order Cupulifera, or oak family, and giving name to the tribe Coryleæ, to which the hornbeams also belong. The European hazel, Corylus Avellana, may become a small tree, and its wood has valuable qualities. The American hazel, C. Americana, is a bush, usually growing in dense thickets from which it excludes nearly all other vegetation. The beaked hazel is C. rostrata, the more northern of the American species. Impressions of leaves have been found in a fossil state a, female catkin; b, female flower; c, male catkin; d, male flower.

which cannot be distinguished from the leaves of C. Americana and C. rostrata. These impressions occur in what is known to geologists as the Fort Union group, of Upper Cretaceous or Lower Tertiary age, in the lower Yellowstone valley in Montana. The type is therefore very ancient. See Corylus.

Their bowes are of tough Hasil, the strings of Leather, arrows of Canes or Hasil, headed with stones or horns, and artificially feathered. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 762.

The younger people making holiday . . .
Went nutting to the hazels.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

II. a. [Attrib. use of the noun. The older adj. is hazelen.] 1. Made of or belonging to the hazel.

They hung me up by the heels, and beat me with hazel-sticks, as if they would have baked me, and have cozened somebody with me for venison.
Beau and Fl., King and No King, iii. 2.

2. Of a light-brown color, like the hazelnut.

Thou wilt quarrel with a man for cracking nuts, having no other reason but because thou hast hazel eyes.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 1.

hazel-crotties (hā'zl-krot'iz), n. A species of lichen, Sticta pulmonaria, used in dyeing yarn and woolen goods. It is also a tonic and an astringent, and has been used for flavoring beer, for making diet-drinks or jellies for invalids, and by the Swedish peasants for epidemic catarrh in cattle and sheep. Also called hazel-rag or hazel-rare. See Sticta. [North. Eng.]

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 2504.

hazeless (hāz'les), a. [< haze¹ + -less.] Without haze; free from haze.

hazel-grouse (hā'zl-grouse), n. A name of the European ruffed grouse, Bonasa betulina, from its frequenting thickets of hazel.

hazel-hen (hā'zl-hen), n. Same as hazel-grouse.

St. Beanus protected the cranes and hazel-hens which built their nests upon the Ulster mountains.
C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 298.

hazelly (hā'zl-i), a. [< haze¹ + -ly or -y¹.] Of the color of the hazelnut; of a light brown.

[Rare.]

hazelnut (hā'zl-nut), n. [< ME. haselnote, < AS. hæselnuttu (= D. haselnoot = MLG. haselnote = OHG. hasalnuz, G. haselnuss = Dan. haselnød, < hæsel, hazel, < hnutu, nut.)] 1. The nut of the hazel. It consists of a hard globose or ovoid pericarp enclosing a single pendulous seed composed of two equal, thick, fleshy hemispherical cotyledons with a very short superior radicle surrounded by a membranaceous testa, the whole inclosed in two large and more or less fleshy coherent bracts with foliaceous summits, in Corylus rostrata prolonged into a beak. The nuts are sometimes solitary, but usually more or less clustered. The nutritious and edible part, or "meat," of the nut is the fleshy cotyledons, which are very agreeably flavored. Hazelnut-oil is used in mixing paints and perfumes. It is also taken for coughs.

(a) Fossil and (b) Recent Leaf of Hazel (Corylus Americana).

From the same Teut. pronominal root hi* are derived *here*¹, *hen*² (obs.), hence, *hethen*² (obs.), hither. The fem. and pl. forms of he began to fall away in the early part of the ME. period, being replaced in part by forms from other stems: see she and they. The aspirate in he, her, him is commonly suppressed in ordinary pronunciation after an accented monosyllable or dissyllable, a suppression which prevails throughout in the case of it, orig. hit, but is not generally acknowledged in regard to the other forms except in intentional representations of colloquial or dialectal speech, as, I told 'im so, see if 'e's in, take 'em away, etc. In formal speech the aspirate is more carefully given.] I. personal pron. A personal pronoun of the third person, the form he being nominative singular masculine. It stands for a noun or another pronoun previously expressed, or in place of such a word not expressed when pointed out by the situation. The various forms of he, including those of Middle English with their Anglo-Saxon originals and their cognates, are here given according to gender and case, with quotations. Idiomatic uses applicable to all forms are then treated without regard to case.

A. Masc. sing. (a) Nom. he, [Colloq. or dial. also e, also ha, a (see ab) < ME. he, he, ha, ho, a, e, < AS. hē = OS. he, hi, hie = OFries. hī, he = MLG. he, LG. he, hei = D. hij = *Goth. his = Icel. hann = Sw. Dan. han: see further in etym. above.]

Ac wel wouth Pouerte! for he may walke vnrobbed Among pilours in pees, yf pacience hym folwe.

Piers Plowman (C), xiv. 1.

Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

1 Cor. x. 12.

If thou beest he—But, O, how fallen! how changed From him who in the happy realms of light, Clothed with transcendent brightness, didst outshine Myriads, though bright!

Milton, E. L., 1. 84.

He who from zone to zone Guides through the boundless sky thy waterfowl.

Bryant, To a Waterfowl.

(b) Poss. (gen.) his (his). [Colloq. or dial. also his, < ME. his, hys, is, yis, < AS. hīs = OFries. hīs = OS. etc., is, from another root: see etym. above.] Of him: now always merely possessive, and preceding the noun, but originally also used objectively with certain verbs. By a confusion of the genitive suffix -es, is with this possessive form of the personal pronoun, the suffix came in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to be often written separately as his: as, Artaxerxes his crown, etc. For this use, see under *his*². For the neuter his, see C (b).

Nys hele nane in God his [Latin in deo ejus, Vulgate]. Ps. iii. 2 (ME. version).

Piers Plowman (C), xi. 237.

(c) Obj. (dat.) him. [Colloq. or dial. also im, < ME. him, hym, < AS. him, hym = OFries. him = D. hem (= MLG. im, em, LG. em = OHG. imo, MHG. ime, im, G. ihm = Goth. imma, from another root: see etym. above.)] This form, originally only dative, is also used as accusative, having displaced the original form for the accusative. See (a). For the neuter him, see C (c).

Deth delt him [dat.] a dent, and drof him [acc.] to the ertre.

Piers Plowman (A), xii. 104.

Whosoever hath, to him shall be given. Mat. xiii. 12.

They gave him to drink vinegar mingled with gall. Mat. xxvii. 34.

They had no such lawe, but they had another, that the King of Persia might doe what him liked.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 354.

The story I had of him is literally true, and well known to be so in the country wherein the circumstances were transacted.

Steele, Tatler, No. 94.

[For the proper objective him is often incorrectly used he in certain constructions where a familiar sequence seems, at the moment, to require that form.]

I cannot think of any character below the flatterer, except he that envies him. Steele, Tatler, No. 208.

Conversely, him is often used, colloquially, for he in the predicate: as, it is him; like it is me for it is I. See It, (d) Obj. (acc.) him. [A substitution of the dative form him, or an accom. to him of the earlier form, ME. him, hine, < AS. hīne = OFries. hīni, hine (also him, hem) (cf. OS. ina = OHG. ina, MHG. in, G. in, G. ihn = Goth. ina, from another root: see etym. above.)] See (c) above.

Wolt thou wedde this maide, yf ich wol assente, For hwe ys fayne of thy felauship, and for to be thy make [mate]?

Piers Plowman (C), iv. 155.

(b) Poss. (gen.) her. [E. dial. also er; < ME. her, hir, here, hīre, hūre, hūr, < AS. hīre, hīre = OFries. hīri = D. haer (cf. OS. hīr, ir, LG. er, ir, LG. er = OHG. ira, iro, MHG. ire, ir, G. ihr = Goth. izas, from another root: see etym. above.)]

Er ich wedde suche a wif, wo me by-tyde! For hwe ys free of hure faith and fikel of hure speche.

Piers Plowman (C), iv. 158.

With more than admiration he admired Her azure veins, her alabaster skin.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 419.

(c) Obj. (dat.) her. [E. dial. also er; < ME. her, hir, hīre, hīre, hūre, hūr, < AS. hīre, hīre = OFries. hīri = D. haer (cf. OS. hīr, ir, LG. er, ir, LG. er = OHG. ira, iro, MHG. ire, ir, G. ihr = Goth. izas, from another root: see etym. above.)]

Gawen drough hym to the damesell, and asked hir of whens she was.

Mervin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 543.

Give me strength Not to tell her, never to let her know.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

(d) Obj. (acc.) her. [E. dial. also er; < ME. her, hir, hīre, hīre, hūre, hūr, < AS. hīre, hīre = OFries. hīri = D. haer (cf. OS. hīr, ir, LG. er, ir, LG. er = OHG. ira, iro, MHG. ire, ir, G. ihr = Goth. izas, from another root: see etym. above.)]

Animas she hatle [is named], as Enuyre hir hateth.

Piers Plowman (B), ix. 7.

That thou hast her, it is not all my grief, And yet it may be said I loved her dearly.

Shak., Sonnets, xlii.

C. Neut. sing. (a) Nom. it. [E. dial. also hit (rather as a corrupt aspiration of the prevalent it as a survival of the orig. form hit), early LO. er, it, < ME. it, yt, hit, hit, < AS. hit, hīt, < OFries. hit = D. het (cf. OS. it = MLG. it, et, LG. et = OHG. izas, ez, MHG. ez, G. es = Goth. it = L. id, et, from another root: see etym. above.)]

Some of vs went to the lande to the village, whiche is right lytel worthe; hit is vnder the Vensyans.

Sir R. Gwyllforde, Fylgrymage, p. 10.

Wealth may be an excellent thing, for it means power, it means leisure, it means liberty.

Lowell, Harvard Anniversary.

(b) Poss. its, formerly his. [The poss. form its is first recorded in print in 1598. It is formed from it by the addition of the common possessive (genitive) suffix -s, of nouns, the nom. and obj. form it being also used for a time in the possessive without a suffix. The substitution arose when the orig. neut. pos. his, which had the same form as the masc. pos. his, began to be regarded as masc. only, thus giving it, when used properly as neut., the appearance of a personification. Earlier mod. E. his, hys, < ME. his, hys, < AS. hīs, in form like the masc. his: see A (b).]

Of beaten work shall the candlestick be made: his shaft, and his branches, his bowls, his knobs, and his flowers, shall be of the same.

Ex. xxv. 31.

It is just so high as it is, and mooves with it owne organs.

Shak., A. and C. (folio 1623), ii. 7.

Doe childe, goe to yt grandams, childe, Glue grandame kingdome, and it grandame will Glue yt a plum, a cherry, and a figge.

The hardest knife ill used doth lose his edge.

Shak., Sonnets, xcv.

The conscious water saw its God and blushed.

Crashaw, Epigram (trans.) (1634).

(c) Obj. (dat.) it. [This is a substitution for the orig. him, the nom. and acc. it being so frequent (by reason of the numerous idiomatic uses of the word) that the dative gave way to the accusative, while in the masc. and fem. the accusative gave way to the dative. Early mod. E. him, < ME. him, hym, < AS. him, etc., in forms like the masc.: see A (c).]

We haue no lymes to labore with; vr lord we hit thonken.

Piers Plowman (A), vii. 117.

Thou art inclined to sleep; 'tis a good dullness, And give it way.

Shak., Tempest, l. 2.

(d) Obj. (acc.) it. [< ME. it, hit, et, < AS. hit, etc., in forms like the nom. See (a) above.]

He (God) is three persones deatable; ich proue hit by mankynde.

Piers Plowman (C), xii. 216.

But vnto him that brougte yt yee hit take Whenne yee haue done.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 5.

Ah, my liege Lord! forgive it unto me, If ought against thine honour I haue tolde.

Spenser, Mulopotmos, l. 102.

[This neuter it is now generally treated as a separate word, having many idiomatic uses of its own. See it.]

D. Masc. fem., and neut. pl. [Obsolete or colloquial (see (c), (d) below), the form they, of different origin, being used in literary English.] (a) Nom. het, hit. [ME. he, heo, his, his, he, hie, hie, hie, < AS. hē, hīe, hīg, hād, hīe = OFries. hīa (in other Teut. forms from a different root, represented by she.)] They: displaced in modern English by they (which see).

Toward Mantrible ridden hi.

Sir Ferunbrun (ed. Ellis), ii. 394.

(b) Poss. (gen.) her, heret. [Now only dial.; < ME. here, hire, hure, huere, hare, here, heore, < AS. hira, hyra, heora = OFries. hiara.] Their: displaced in modern English by their (which see, under they).

Thenne cam Pilatus with mucche people . . .
To seou houduhtliche Deth sholdo do and deme here beyor [of both of them] ryght.

Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 36.

(c) Obj. (dat.) hemt, emt, 'em. [Common in early mod. E., in which it came to be regarded as a contr. of the equiv. them, and was therefore in the 17th century often printed 'hem, 'em; in present use only colloq., written 'em (see 'em); < ME. hein, ham, hom, heom, henen, < AS. him, heom = OFries. hīm, hīm, hīmnen, etc. (cf. Goth. im, from another root: see etym. above.)] Them. See they.

And [he] precheth to the people seynt Poules wordes, . . .

MS. Rawl. Poet. 145. (Halliwell.)

(d) Obj. (acc.) hemt, emt, 'em. [< ME. hem, hom, etc.; a substitution for the orig. he, hīe, etc. (same form as the nom.), the dative having displaced the accusative here as in the singular (see A (d)).] See (c) above.] Them. See they.

He could coin or counterfeit
New words, with little or no wit; . . .
And when with hasty noise he spoke 'em,
The ignorant for current took 'em.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 113.

His friends — as Angels I received 'em,
His foes — the Devil had suborn'd 'em,
Tennyson, Queen Mary, i. 5.

In early use and in modern dialectal speech he is often found with reference to inanimate objects where present regular usage requires it. In early use this is generally due to the agreement required by the grammatical gender; in modern use it is due rather to personification or to mere mixture. An actual change of hit or it to he is not to be supposed.

From South to North he [England] ys long eight hundred myle.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 2.

A staffe of six verses is very pleasant to the eare, and also serveth for a greater complement then the interlour staves, which maketh him more commonly to be used.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 55.

The possessive may be used without a noun following, the feminine her, like our and your, then taking, in modern use, an additional genitive suffix -s, as in his, namely, hers.

This was his desir and hire also.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 221.

And what his fortune wanted, hers could mend.
Dryden.

A thing always becomes his at last who says it best, and thus makes it his own.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 41.

For the reflexive and emphatic form of he, see himself.

II. demonstr. pron. This one; that one.

Manye a man that may nat stonde a pul,
It likyth him at wrastling for to be,
And demen yit, wher [whether] he do bet or he,
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 166.

III. n. 1. A male person; a man: correlative to she, a woman. [Now only humorous.]

Here I stand to answer thee,
Or any he the proudest of thy sort,
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 2.

One that dares step as far to gain my freedom
As any he that breathes.

Fletcher, Double Marriage, l. 1.

2. A male animal; a beast, bird, or fish of the male sex: correlative to she, a female animal. Hence much used attributively or as an adjective prefix, signifying 'male', with names of animals, he and she thus prefixed supplying the place in English of the distinctive suffixes common in other tongues and used to some extent in Anglo-Saxon (compare fox, færen, vixen): as, a he-beast, he-cat, he-goat, correlative to she-beast, etc. The use occurs first in Middle English, when the regular suffixes of gender, distinct in Anglo-Saxon, fell away or became confused. These prefixes are sometimes also used contemptuously with reference to persons.

They haue many hee and shee-Saints, in great veneration, with long legends of their lives.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 444.

All the he and she scoundrels of the capital, writhed and twisted together, rush by you.

Thackeray, Paris Sketch Book, On Some Fashionable [French] Novels.

he² (hē), interj. A sound made in calling, laughing, etc.: as, He! he! an archers' word of call.

head (hed), n. and a. [The spelling ea indicates the orig. long vowel; early mod. E. also head, hed; < ME. hed (i. e., hēd), hede, heed, contr. of earlier heved, hevid, heaved, haved, < AS. heafod (gen. heafdes), the head (lit. and fig.), = OS. hobhid = OFries. haved, hafid, hād = D. hoofd = MLG. hövet, LG. hövet, höfde = OHG. houbit, MHG. houbet, houpit, also houbet, G. haupt (dial. haid, hād, heed, after LG.) = Icel. höfuð = Sw. hufvud = Dan. hoved = Goth. hauþith, the head (prob. connected with AS. hūfe, ME. houwe, howe, Sc. how, a hood, = MLG. E. chief, capital, cape², etc.). The Gr. κεφαλή, the head, agrees with the rare and AS. hafala, hafela, also written heafela, heafola, the head; but this is appar. not connected with head, head: cf. Skt. kapāla, a cup, the skull.] I. n. 1. The upper part or division of the human body, consisting of the more or less rounded skull and its integuments and contents, the organs of sight, hearing, taste, etc., with the mouth and its parts, and joined to the trunk by the neck; in an extended sense, the corresponding part of any animal's body; the front, fore, or top part or oral end of an animal, in any way distinguished from the rest of the body, as by being borne upon a neck; the end opposite the tail. In all vertebrates except the lancelets, which have no skull or brain, the head is a prominent part. In arthropods, as insects and crustaceans, the head is an anterior part of the body in some way distinguished from the thorax, as by the coalescence of a number of the primitively distinct somites of the body into one segment, and the conversion of the appendages of these confluent somites into mouth-parts and organs of special sense; though the outward separation between head and thorax is often obscure or null. (See cephalothorax.) In the great group of worms, or annelipodous anneloid animals, the head is simply the oral as opposed to the aboral end of the body. In molluscous animals a head is frequently recognizable by its mouth, tentacles, etc.; but in many there is no such distinction, these being called in consequence acephalous or headless. Still lower in the scale, the term head can be applied only, if at all, to the oral end of an animal. (See cranium and skull.) In certain Vermes the head is the whole mature individual excepting its generative buds, joints, or strobila: as, the head of a tapeworm.

Hou longe ssolle hor luther [lither] heued above hor soldren be?
Rob. of Gloucester, l. 126.

Both wife and barnes upon him fell

Mandeville, Travels, p. 107.

It was one of those heads which Guido has often painted — mild, pale, penetrating.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 8.

2. Mental faculty regarded as seated in the head; intelligence; understanding; will or resolution; inclination; mind.

For what thorw werre and wycked hyfdes,
May no preclour pesse make in no place, hit semeth.
Piers Plowman (C), xviii. 85.

Would Chloe know if you're alive or dead?
She bids her footman put it in her head.

Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 178.

When in ordinary discourse we say a man has a fine head, a long head, or a good head, we express ourselves metaphorically, and speak in relation to his understanding.

Addison, The Hood.

Of this siege M. Viollet-le-Duc gives a long and minute account, which the visitor who has a head for such things may follow, with the brochure in hand, on the fortifications themselves.

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 149.

3. An individual animal or person; especially, an animal or a person considered as merely one of a number: as, to charge so much a head. [In this use after a number the plural is heads.]

A company of giddy heads will take upon them to define how many shall be saved.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 626.

Thirty thousand head of swine.

The red deer, which toward the beginning of this century amounted to about five hundred head.

Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, vi.

4. One who has the first rank or place, and to whom others are subordinate; a principal person; a leader; a chief: as, the head of an army; the head of a sect or party.

Sittchen ich am goure ale hefd [the head of you all] ich am goure ale hele.
Piers Plowman (C), xxii. 473.

The husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church.

Cowper, Truth, l. 189.

(c) The antlers of a deer.

But, sir, I assure ye, it was a buck of the first head [that is, of the fifth year].

Shak., I. i. l. iv. 2.

6. A part of a thing regarded as in some degree resembling the human head in position, form, or importance. (a) The top, especially when distinguished in some way from the rest of the thing: as, the head of a pin, of a spear, of a nail, of a mast.

He hid him to the head of the house,

To the house top of Fyvie.

Andrew Lamorie (Child's Ballads, II. 196).

As much as the full moon doth [overshine] the cinders of the element, which show like pins' heads to her.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 3.

(b) The top or upper part of a plant the leaves of which form a single more or less compact mass: as, a head of grain or of lettuce.

The wheat and barley which they sowed last winter are already in full head.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 49.

(c) In bot., a more or less globular cluster of sessile or nearly sessile flowers centripetal in development, as in the plane-tree, button-bush, clover, etc. By the shortening of the rays the umbel becomes a head, as in Eryngium, Sanicula, etc. In the Compositae the flowers are always collected into a head, but they are then situated on a conical, flat, or even concave receptacle. Gray calls such a head the anthodium, from the resemblance of the whole head to a single flower. In the Characeae Sachs applies the term head (kopfchen) to a peculiar hyaline cell situated at the central end of each of the eight manubria. See head-cell, and cut under anthodium. (d) The main point or part: that which constitutes the most conspicuous or most important feature.

True, I have married her:

The very head, and front, of my offending
Hath this extent, no more.

Shak., Othello, I. 3.

(e) The fore part; hence, the foremost place; the most prominent or honorable position; as, the head of a ship (which includes the bows on both sides); the head of a procession, of a column of troops, or of a class; the head of the table; the head of a profession.

After 7 miles riding, passing thro' a wood heretofore sacred to Juno, we came to Montefascone, the head of the Falisci.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 4, 1644.

Where Macgregor sits, there is the head of the table.

Highland proverb.

Gorizia has been for ages the head of a principality.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 9.

(f) That end of a thing which is regarded as the upper end; as, the head of a bed; the head of a street.

At the other hede of the halle was, high vppolofte,

A wonderfull werke weghes to beholde.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1672.

He put his hand at her bed head,

And there he found a gude grey horn.

Leesome Brand (Child's Ballads, II. 346).

The sheets thus produced receive their first fold (in the heads) in the direction of the axis of the cylinders which carry them; the second fold (down the "back") is given by a bar.

Ure, Dict., IV. 682.

(g) Of a barrel or the like, either end when closed; hence, the material with which either end is closed: as, to knock out both heads of a cask. (h) That which rises to the top, as the froth on a pot of beer.

I add to the residual partially purified goods a ley of moderate strength only (instead of the finishing ley for curd soap), and boil, taking care that no head is formed.

Watt, Soap-making, p. 73.

(i) That part of an abscess or a boil where it breaks or seems likely to break: often used figuratively. (j) The principal source, or one of the sources, as of a stream; the remotest point from the mouth or opening into a sea or lake, as of a creek, bay, or gulf; a source or spring in general.

Now I see

The mystery of your loneliness, and find

Your salt tears' head.

Shak., A. and C., I. 3.

Those bless'd flowers that dwell

At the rough stream's calm head, thrive and do well.

Donne, Satires (ed. 1819).

Whence should this flood of passion, trow, take head?

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

(k) The accumulation of oil in oil-tubes when the pumps are idle. (l) A reliquary in the shape of a human head.

See chef, 3. (m) A headland or promontory, as in the names Gay Head, Flamborough Head.

Our overplus of shipping will we burn;
And, with the rest full-mann'd, from the head of Actium Beat the approaching Caesar.

Shak., A. and C., iii. 7.

At a head of land a little short they beheaded two sachems.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 273.

(n) A special part of a tool, instrument, etc., having some analogy with the human head, as the upper or steel part of an anvil; the riser, sprue, or sillage-piece of a casting; the obverse of a coin; the capital of a column; the striking part of a hammer. In contradistinction to the helve, and the pole as distinguished from the claw or peck: the upper part of a lathe; the lathe-stock in which is the live spindle, as distinguished from the tail-stock, which contains the dead spindle; the top edge of a book; the top of a door, etc. (o) A bundle of flax measuring probably 2 feet in length, and weighing a few pounds. In Dorsetshire a head of hemp weighs 4 pounds. According to the statute of Edward I. called Tractatus de ponderibus et mensuris, a head of linen is 10 yards: "Chief de fustiano constat ex tredecim ulnis: caput fiondis ex decem ulnis." (p) In whaling: (1) The upper end of a piece of blubber in boarding;

the square end cut off from the main piece, and separately hauled in. (2) That part of a whale which includes the white-horse, junk, and case, as of a sperm-whale, or the whalebone and some blubber of a baleen-whale. (g) In torioise-shell manuf., the larger plates, taken collectively, of the upper shell of the caret or hawk's-bill turtle, usually thirteen in number. (7) In musical notation, the principal part of a note—that is, that part which indicates by its position on the staff the pitch of the tone: as,  distinguished from the stem or tail. (See note.)

Heads are either open, as in semibreves and minims, or solid, as in crotchets, quavers, etc. (g) In various stringed musical instruments of the lute and viol families, that part of the instrument above the neck where the tuning-pegs are inserted. It is usually carved ornamentally, especially in the older instruments. See lute, viol, guitar, etc. (h) In musical instruments of the drum family, the stretched membrane covering one or both of the ends, by striking which the tone is produced. The tension of the head and thus the pitch of the tone are governed by a ring around the edge, which may be raised or lowered, relaxing or tightening the membrane. See drum, tambourine. 7. In hydros., the height of water above a given level, as in a pond or reservoir, considered as a measure of its quantity or force of fall: also reckoned in terms of the pressure of the water per square inch at the given level: as, a reservoir with forty feet head of water. See fall.

A mill driven by a fall of water, whose virtual head is ten feet. Grier, Mechanics' Dict.

8. In pneumatics, the difference of pressure on a unit of base existing between two fluid columns of different densities communicating at their bases: estimated as the height of a column of the denser fluid whose pressure on a unit of its base is equal to the difference: as, the head which determines the velocity of flow in a chimney.—9. In steam- and gas-engin., the pressure of a confined volume of steam or gas upon a unit of the interior surface of a confining vessel, estimated in terms either of weight or of the height of a column of water or mercury which would exert the same pressure upon a unit of area of its base: as, a full head of steam.—10. A culmination or crisis; height; force; strength; pitch. Compare def. 6 (f).

Foul sin, gathering head,
Shall break into corruption.

Shak., Rich. II., v. 1.
Now does my project gather to a head.

The indisposition which has long hung upon me is at last grown to such a head that it must quickly make an end of me, or of itself. Addison.

11. Power; armed force.

And 'tis no little reason bids us speed,
To save our heads by raising of a head.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3.

Before I drew this gallant head of war,
And call'd these fiery spirits from the world.

Shak., K. John, v. 2.

Ten thousand Cornish,
Grudging to pay your subsidies, have gather'd
A head.

Gin we meet a' together in a head the morn,
We'll be merry men.

Pray of Support (Child's Ballads, VI. 117).

12. A chief point or subject; one of a number of successive topics of discourse, or a summary thereof: as, the heads of a discourse or treatise.

If I would study the Canon-Law as it is used in England, I must study the Heads here in use.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 31.

headache (hed'äk), n. [Formerly head-ach, head-ake, headake, headache, < ME. headake, heavedeche, < AS. heafodece, < heafod, head, + ece, ache; see ache.] 1. A pain in the cranial part of the head, apparently somewhat deep-seated as compared with the sensation produced by a superficial irritation of the scalp. Apart from trauma, headaches may be produced in various ways, and they are classified mainly by their causes. The following groups may be distinguished: (a) Headaches depending on abnormal states of the blood, as in anemia; or when waste products accumulate in the blood through the inefficiency of the excretory organs, as in Bright's disease; or when the lungs, through pulmonary or cardiac fault or the closeness of rooms, fail to replace carbon dioxide with oxygen and to remove the other impurities which they should remove; or when poisons are taken into the system, as in coal-gas poisoning; or when there is absorption of poisons formed in the alimentary tract (as in constipation), or unusual fermentative processes go on in that tract; or when poisons are formed in the blood or solid tissues, as in zymotic diseases or in lithemic states. (b) Headaches dependent on exhaustion, such as those from overwork or excess of any kind, forming a part of a general neurasthenia, or after epileptic attacks. Hysterical headaches may perhaps be included here. (c) Headaches dependent on peripheral irritation, as from the alimentary canal, from the nose or pharynx, from the sexual apparatus, or from eye-strain incident to errors in refraction or insufficiencies of the muscles moving the eyeball. Some of these belong doubtless quite as properly to the preceding class. (d) Headaches dependent on hyperemia or ischemia of the brain and its envelops. The effect of change of posture on the intensity of most headaches seems to indicate that congestion or the reverse has a capacity for provoking pain in the head. But this class is one of uncertain limits. (e) Headaches from overheating, as from exposure to the sun. The headache of zymotic fevers seems to be due in part to the fever (pyrexia). (f) Migraine. (g) Headaches from gross lesions, as tumor, meningitis, or hemorrhage.

2. The corn-popper, Papaver Rhoeas, the odor of which is said to cause headache. Also called head-wark. [Eng.]—Blind-headache, a headache in which there is hyperesthesia of the retina of the eye, or amblyopia, or hemianopsia. health (helth), n. [< ME. helth, < AS. hēlth, health, healing, cure (= OHG. heilida, health) (more commonly hēlu, hēlo, health, safety, salvation: see heal¹, n.), < hāl, whole, hale: see whole, hale², hail², heal¹.] The word is thus an abstract noun from whole, not from heal. 1. Soundness of body; that condition of a living organism and of its various parts and functions which conduces to efficient and prolonged life; a normal bodily condition. Health implies also, physiologically, the ability to produce offspring fitted to live long and to perform efficiently the ordinary functions of their species.

It is as "the outward sign of freedom, the realisation of the universal will," that health may be set at once as sign and as goal of the harmonious operation of the whole system — as sign and as goal of a realisation of life. J. H. Stirling, Secret of Hegel, II. 554.

2. In an extended use, the general condition of the body with reference to the degree of soundness and vigor, whether normal or impaired: as, good health; ill health; how is your health?

That health of the body is best which is ablest to endure all alterations and extremities. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 270.

3. Natural vigor of the faculties; moral or intellectual soundness.

We have left undone those things which we ought to have done; And we have done those things which we ought not to have done: And there is no health in us.

Book of Common Prayer, General Confession.

The beautiful solemn words of the ritual had done him good, and restored much of his health.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, vi.

4. Power of healing, or giving health; capacity for restoring, strengthening, enlightening, purifying, etc.: chiefly in Scripture.

That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations. Ps. lxxvii. 2.

The tongue of the wise is health. Prov. xii. 18.

5. A salutation or a toast; an invocation of health and happiness for another: as, to drink a health to one.

Thou worthy lord
Of that unworthy wife that greeteth thee,
Health to thy person! Shak., Lucrece, l. 1305.

Lady Margerie was the first ladye
That drank to him the wine O;
And eve as the healths gaed round and round,
"Laddy, your love is mine O."

Sweet Willie and Lady Margerie (Child's Ballads, II. 53).

Well—come, give us a bottle of good wine, and we'll drink the lads' healths. Sheridan, School for Scandal, ii. 3.

Bill of health. See bill. — Board of health, a board of commissioners appointed by the government of the United States or of any State, city, or town, to make regulations for preventing the spread of contagious or infectious diseases, to promote or regulate sanitary conditions in particular cases, and in other ways to care for the public health. The National Board of Health consists of several members appointed by the President, one medical officer of the army, one of the navy, one of the marine hospital service, and one officer of the department of justice. It cooperates with State and municipal boards, and reports upon and endeavors to increase their efficiency.—Figure of health. See figure.—Health laws, statutes regulating the general sanitary conditions by the organization of boards of health.

healthful (helth'fūl), a. [< health + -ful.] 1. Full of or in the enjoyment of health; free from disease; healthy: as, a healthful body or a healthful condition. [In this sense healthy is more common.]

The virtue which the world wants is a healthful virtue, not a valetudinarian virtue. Macaulay, Leigh Hunt.

2. Serving to promote health; salubrious; wholesome; salutary: as, a healthful air or climate; a healthful diet.

Send down . . . the healthful spirit of thy grace.
Book of Common Prayer, Prayer for Clergy and People.

In books, or work, or healthful play,
Let my first years be past.
Watts, How doth the Little Busy Bee.

A few cheerful companions in our walks will render them abundantly more healthful. V. Knox, Essays, c.

3. Well disposed; cheerful. [Rare.]
Gave healthful welcome to their ship-wreck'd guests.
Shak., C. of E., i. 1.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 58.

2. Conducive to health; wholesome; salubrious; healthful. [In this sense healthful is generally preferred.]

Gardening or husbandry, and working in wood, are fit and healthy recreations for a man of study or business.
Locke.

And therefore that love of action which would put death out of sight is to be counted good, as a holy and healthy thing (one word, whose meanings have become unduly severed).
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, i. 237.

3. Safe; prudent. [Slang.] = Syn. 1. Vigorous, hearty, robust, strong; Healthy, Healthful, Wholesome, Salutary, Saluta'y. A distinction between healthy and healthful is nearly established. Healthy is applicable to the condition of body or mind; healthful to that which produces health. Wholesome is sometimes preferred to healthful on the ground of euphony, but commonly applies chiefly to food, as salubrious applies chiefly to air, climate, and the like. Salutary has mainly a moral significance: as, a salutary effect; salutary influence. Healthy and wholesome are often used figuratively; the others are not.

heap (hēp), n. A dialectal form of hame.
heap (hēp), n. [*< ME. heap, a heap, crowd, multitude, < AS. hēap, a band, troop, crowd, multitude (of persons), rarely a pile (of things), = OS. hōp = OFries. hāp = D. hoop = MLG. hōp, LG. hoop, hope, also hupe, hupe = OHG. houf and hūfo, MHG. houf, houfe, and hūf, hūfe, G. haufe = Icel. hōpr = Sw. hōp = Dan. hob (the vowel in the Scand. words being conformed to that of the LG.), a troop, crowd, multitude. Gay, Trivia, iii. 336.

hear (hēr), v.; pret. and pp. heard, ppr. hearing. [*< ME. heren, heeren (pret. herde, pp. herd), < AS. hīeran, hēran, hīran (pret. hīrde, pp. hīred) = OS. hōrian = OFries. hēra, hōra = D. hooren = MLG. hōren, LG. hören, hūren = OHG. hōren, MHG. G. hören = Icel. heyra = Sw. hōra = Dan. høre (all these forms with r for orig. s) = Goth. haurjan, hear. It is hard to see the suggested connection with Gr. ἀκούειν (for *ἀκωσείν, orig. *κωσείν?—cf. κοῦν for ἀκούειν in Hesychius), hear. Some take Teut. h-, Gr. ἄν-, κ-, as a reduced prefix, and connect the verb with L. audire (orig. *ausdire?), hear, auscultare, listen, Goth. auso, etc., = E. ear = Gr. οὖς (ὠτ-, orig. *ōwāt-, ear: see acoustic, audience, audit, etc., auscultation, earl. Hence ult. hark, harken.] I. trans. 1. To perceive by the ear; receive an impression of through the auditory sense; take cognizance of by harkening.*

Not knowing whether nose, or ears, or eyes,
Smelt, hard, or saw, more saucous, sounds, or Dies.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bart's Weeks, ii., Eden.

O friends! I hear the tread of nimble feet.
Milton, P. L., iv. 866.

Where you stand you cannot hear
From the groves within
The wild-bird's din.
Tennyson, The Poet's Mind.

2. To pay regard to by listening; give ear to; give audience to; mark and consider what is said by; listen to for the purpose of learning, awarding, judging, determining, etc.: as, to hear prayer; to hear a lesson or an argument; to hear an advocate or a cause, as a judge.

There is the Awltier, where our Lady herde the Aungeles syng Messe.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 91.

Hear my cry, O God; attend unto my prayer.
Ps. lxi. 1.

He sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ.
Acts xxiv. 24.

Hear, all ye Trojans, all ye Grecian bands,
What Paris, author of the war, demands.
Pope, Iliad, iii.

3. To listen to understandingly; learn or comprehend by harkening; hence, to learn by verbal statement or report.

Sir, do rede this letter that my lorde hath the sente, and than shalt thou heren his wille and his corage.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 620.

He began with right a merry chere
His tale anon, and said as ye shul here.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., i. 860.

This is an hard saying; who can hear it? John vi. 60.

Toward the evening, a relation of the sheik's came from Bayret, where, he said, he had heard that I walked about the city, and had observed every thing very curiously, which had alarmed the people.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 97.

4. To be a hearer of; attend usually the ministrations of: as, what minister do you hear? [Colloq.]—5†. To be called. [A Latinism.]
Bright effluence of bright essence increase,
Or hear'st thou rather (wouldst thou rather hear thyself called) pure ethereal stream,
Whose fountain who shall tell?
Milton, P. L., iii. 7.
To hear a bird sing. See bird.—To hear a book. See book.—To hear say, to hear a person say; learn by general report. [Obsolete or colloquial.]

Dere frende Merlin, I haue herde say that ye loved well my fader, Vterpendragon. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 114.
Painting, sir, I have heard say, is a mystery [craft].
Shak., M. for M., iv. 2.
I have heard say (again to take a trifling matter) that at the beginning of this century it was a subject of serious, nay, of angry controversy, whether it began with January 1800, or January 1801.

J. H. Newman, Gram., of Assent, p. 363.
To hear tell, of, to hear some or any one talk about; listen to what is said about. [Obsolete or colloquial.]

She cannot endure to hear tell of a husband.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1.

II. intrans. 1. To possess the sense of hearing; have that form of sense-perception which is dependent on the ear.

The hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord hath made even both of them. Prov. xx. 12.

You are so sadly deaf, my dear,
What shall I do to make you hear?
Couper, Mutual Forbearance.

2. To listen; harken; give heed.

Hear ye now, O house of David. Isa. vii. 13.
Dost thou hear? gav'st thou my letter to Julia?

Shak., T. G. of V., i. 1.
When themes like these employ the poet's tongue,
I hear as mute as if a syren sung.
Couper, Table-Talk, l. 199.

3. To be told; learn by report; as, so I hear.
When the Queen heard of the King's Proclamation, she knew there was no returning for her into England without some good Assistance. Baker, Chronicles, p. 111.

Charm'd with the sight, the world, I cried,
Shall hear of this thy deed.
Couper, Dog and Water-Lily.

4a. To be heard, or heard of; be reported.

I will no more of these superfluous excesses. They are these make me hear so ill both in town and country.
B. Jonson, Love Restored.

Our King and Parliament have been at great strife who should obtain most Justice; if they would now strive who should show most Mercy, it would hear well through out the world.
N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 70.

Hear, hear! an exclamation used to call attention to the words of a speaker, and usually to express approbation.—I (he, etc.) will not hear of, I (he, etc.) will not entertain the idea of; I (he, etc.) will not have to do with.

He will not hear of drugs. B. Jonson, Volpone, i. 1.

To hear to, to yield or consent to; heed; regard; as, to hear to reason; he refused to hear to the arrangement.

He will not hear to the suggestion that they may be giving account of different battles.
Stowe, Origin of Books of the Bible, p. 304.

heared. An obsolete or dialectal form of *heard*¹.

hearer (hêr'êr), n. [< ME. herer, herere (= G. hörer), < heren, hear.] One who hears; one who listens to what is orally delivered by another; an auditor; one of an audience.

Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only. Jas. i. 22.

They thought they must have died, they were so bad; Their peevish hearers almost wish they had.
Couper, Conversation, l. 324.

hearing (hêr'ing), n. [< ME. heringe, herunge (= OHG. hōrunga); verbal n. of hear, v.] 1. Perception of sound; the act of perceiving sound; the faculty or sense by which sound is perceived; audition; one of the five external senses. See *ear*¹.

But their loud instruments doe rather affright then delight the hearing. Sandys, Travailes, p. 56.

Yet in these ears, till hearing dies,
One set slow bell will seem to toll.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, lvi.

2. Audience; opportunity to be heard.

I come with gracious offers from the king,
If you vouchsafe me hearing and respect.
Shak., I Hen. IV., iv. 3.

The excitement of the House was such that no other speaker could obtain a hearing; and the debate was adjourned.
Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

3. A judicial investigation of a suit at law; attention to and consideration of the testimony and arguments in a cause between parties, with a view to a just decision: especially used of trial without a jury.

I have a couple of brawling neighbours, that, I'll assure you, will not agree, and you shall have the hearing of their matter.
Beau. and Fl., Cocombo, v. 3.

His last offences to us

Shall have judicious hearing. Shak., Cor., v. 5.

4. Distance within which sound may be heard; ear-shot: as, he was not within hearing.

Thou hast spoken in mine hearing. Job xxxiii. 8.
Where stood that renowned City of Corinth, in hearing of both seas, and having a port unto either.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 7.

For I never whisper'd a private affair
Within the hearing of cat or mouse . . .
But I heard it shouted at once from the top of the house.
Tennyson, Maud, xxvii.

She aye ordered a dram, or a sowp kale, or something to us, after she had gien us a hearing on our duties.
Scott, Old Mortality, xiv.

6. Something heard; something to hear; report; news. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

In trueth this which you tell is a most shamefull hearing.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

Fran. Lady, I've lov'd you long.
Ric. 'Tis a good hearing, sir.

Middletown (and others), The Widow, i. 2.
It was, in the Scotch phrase, a good hearing, and put me in good-humor with the world.

R. L. Stevenson, Inland Voyage, p. 115.

7. Attendance on preaching. [Prov. Eng.]

I have learned since, that he . . . has a mother, between seventy and eighty, who walks, every Sunday, eight miles to hearing, as they call it, and back again.
Couper, Works, VII. 38.

Hard of hearing. See hard.—Hearing in presence, in the Court of Session of Scotland, a formal hearing of counsel before all the judges.—Organs of hearing, the auditory apparatus; the ear and associate structures, adapted to receive vibrations of the air, called sound-waves. These organs consist, in the higher animals, essentially of the end-organs of a special nerve, bathed in a fluid usually containing some hard body or otolith, and receiving and being excited to molecular motion by impacts of sound-waves conducted to the nervous parts through special passages closed by a membrane, furnished in many cases with a special set of auditory ossicles, and usually communicating with the pharynx through a vestige of the first postoral visceral cleft. See *ear*¹.

hearingless (hêr'ing-less), a. [< hearing + -less.] Deaf.

Not having had, as yet, an opportunity of looking at the Salisbury codex, I can judge of it only from hearsay.

Rock, Church of our Fathers i. 6.
Sometimes a rumor, a hearsay, an inarticulate whisper, Came with its airy hand to point and beckon her forward.

Longfellow, Evangeline, ii. 1.

Let a prejudice be bequeathed, carried in the air, adopted by hearsay, . . . however it may come, these minds will give it habitation.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 12.

II. a. Of or pertaining to or depending upon hearsay, or the talk of others; told or given at second hand.

Liabie to be imposed upon by the hearsay relations of credulity.

Goldsmith, Pref. to Brookes's Nat. Hist.

She blamed herself for telling hearsay tales.

Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

Hearsay evidence, evidence at second hand; testimony the relevancy of which does not consist in what the witness giving it himself perceived, but in what he derived by information from another person. It is generally excluded as objectionable, because its credibility cannot be estimated from the credit to be given to the witness, but depends on the veracity or competency of the third person, not before the court. Thus, if a witness testifies that a bystander told him that the prisoner struck the deceased, this is hearsay, for its credibility depends on the bystander, and he should be produced; but if he testifies that the accused admitted to him that he had struck the deceased, or, before the blow, told him he intended to strike it, or testifies that he heard the outcry of the deceased on being struck, it is not hearsay. Exceptions to the rule are made in respect to some forms of tradition as to facts of family history, and boundaries, and dying declarations (which see, under declaration).

In some cases (as in proof of any general customs, or matters of common tradition or repute), the courts admit of hearsay evidence, or an account of what persons deceased have declared in their life-time.

Blackstone, Com., III. xxiii.

hearse¹ (hêrs), n. [As a historical term, referring to obsolete senses, and as a term of fortification (< F. herse), spelled herse (see *herse*¹); early mod. A medieval iron hearse, said to be unique, stands in the aisle of Tanfield church, Durham, England, over a tomb of the Marmion family.

In the Vestrye ther ys an herse that stonde full of Chalye . . . wher in yst cloyd many grett Reliquies.

Turkington, Diario of Eng. Travell, p. 9.

2. A bier; a bier with a coffin.

Set down your honourable load,
If honour may be shrouded in a hearse.
Shak., Kich. III., i. 2.

Hugh Bishop of Lincoln lying very sick, he not only went to visit him; but being dead, was one of the three Kings . . . that carried his Herse upon their shoulders.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 74.

Decked with flowers, a simple hearse
To the churchyard forth they bear.

Longfellow, Blind Girl of Castel-Cuillè, iii.

3. A carriage for conveying a dead person to the grave. The usual modern form has an oblong-roofed body, often with glass sides, and a door at the back for the insertion of the coffin.

4a. A temporary monument erected over a grave.
—5a. A dirge or threnody, or a solemn recital or chant.

For the faire Damzel from the holy herse
Her love-sicke hart to other thoughts did steale.

Spenser, E. Q., III. iii. 48.

6. In her-, a charge resembling a portcullis or a harrow.

It is a hollow muscular, or otherwise contractile organ which receives blood in its interior, and by contractions or pulsations drives it out again, and thus keeps up the circulation of this fluid. In its simplest form, as in the early embryo of a vertebrate and in many invertebrate animals, it is simply an expanded part or expansion in the course of a blood-vessel, capable of beating, pulsating, or alternately dilating and contracting, and so acting upon the contained fluid mechanically. (See cuts under Astacidae and Balanoglossus.) In the process of development one or both orifices of this bulb are furnished with a valve permitting the flow of blood in one direction and preventing it in the other; and the bulb is partly divided by a constriction across it, one of the resulting parts being specially devoted to the reception of blood, as from a vein, and its transmission only into the other part, which then by contraction urges it onward, as into an artery. This is the structure of the two-chambered or bilocular heart of the lower vertebrates, in which the receiving-chamber is the auricle, the distributing-chamber is the ventricle, and the communication between them is the auriculoventricular opening. In a more complex form the bilocular heart is partly divided into right and left halves by a constriction or partition which separates the single auricle into two, the result being the three-chambered or trilocular heart, in which one auricle, the right, receives venous blood from the body at large, the left auricle receives aerated or arterial blood from gills or lungs, and each auricle pours its blood through its own auriculoventricular orifice into a common and single ventricle, which then sends a current of mixed venous and arterial blood to all parts of the body. Such is the type of the reptilian heart; though the right and left auricles are in fact incompletely separated from each other, retaining an intersauricular opening, which in the embryos of birds and mammals is known as the foramen ovale. Finally, the entire separation of the auricles, and complete division of a common ventricular cavity into a right and a left ventricle by an interventricular septum or partition, result in the perfectly four-chambered or quadrilocular heart of all adult vertebrates above reptiles. Here the right and left sides of the heart, each consisting of an auricle and a ventricle, are entirely separate, so that no mixture of venous and arterial currents is possible. (See circulation of the blood, under circulation.) The ventricles are larger and more muscular than the auricles, since the former have to drive the blood through the body, while the auricles have only to inject it into the ventricles. All the orifices of the heart are more or less completely guarded by sets of valves. The right auriculoventricular valves are called tricuspid; the left, mitral: in both cases from their form in the human heart, in which three membranous valves on the right side and two on the left are operated by delicate fibrous cords (the chordae tendineae) and certain muscular processes from the ventricular walls (the columnae carneae). The orifices of the aorta and of the pulmonary artery are alike guarded by three crescentic valves, called, from their shape, the semilunar valves. The orifices by which veins enter either auricle either are or are not provided with valves, in different cases, or in different animals. The contraction of the muscular walls of the heart as a whole, or of any one of its chambers, is the systole; the corresponding and alternating dilatation of its cavities, or any one of them, is the diastole; the two movements together complete a cardiac cycle. In vertebrates the heart is situated in the thorax, between the lungs, and enveloped in a serous membrane, the pericardium, which is generally a closed sac with one layer, the visceral or cardiac pericardium, or epicardium, investing the whole surface of the organ and the roots of the great vessels which spring from it, and the other, the parietal layer, reflected over the surface of adjacent structures. The primitive position of the heart is always median; but in the course of its development from the embryo it generally becomes tilted over to one side, the left, as is usual in the higher vertebrates, where the point or apex of the organ lies considerably to the left, and the whole organ becomes unsymmetrical both in its own shape and in its relative position. In general the form of the heart is conoidal, with the base (the auricles) upward or forward, and the apex (the ventricles) downward or backward and sinistral. In man the heart is about 5 inches long, 3½ inches in greatest width, and 2 inches in greatest depth; it weighs 10 or 12 ounces in the male, and 8 or 10 in the female. It lies obliquely in the chest, with its broad fixed base uppermost, a little backward and to the right; its free apex downward, forward, and to the left, so that its beating may be seen or felt at a point an inch or less to the inner side of, and about an inch and a half below, the left nipple, between the fifth and sixth ribs. All the cavities of the heart are lined with a thin smooth membrane, the endocardium, which also invests the valves and is directly continuous with the lining of all the vessels which enter or leave the heart. Its substance, the myocardium, is almost entirely muscular; the muscle is a peculiar striated one, of a deep-red color; its fibers are intricately disposed in two sets, auricular and ventricular, separated by fibrous rings which surround the auriculoventricular orifices. It is supplied with blood for its own nourishment by the right and left coronary arteries, the first branches of the aorta; they are accompanied by cardiac veins. Its nerves are derived from the cardiac plexuses, formed by the pneumogastric and sympathetic nerves. Its action is involuntary. In all other mammals, and in birds, the heart is substantially the same as in man, with differences in relative size, in shape, and in the detail of its openings and valves; but in the acranial vertebrates, the lancelets, it is rudimentary. Chaucer, Prolog, to Squire's Tale, l. 27.

heartly, adv. [< ME. hertely, herteliche (= D. hertelijk = MLG. herteliken = MHG. herzelichen, G. herzlich = Dan. hjerterlig = Sw. hjerterlig), < herte, heart: see heartly, a.] Heartly.

To these kynges he come & his cause tolde,
And to haue of hor helpe hertly dyspyred.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1020.

The kyng be-heilde Vlfin, and sangh hym laugh hertely,
And than he required hym to telle why he dede laugh so sore.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 169.

heart-net (här'tnet), n. The heart-shaped net or pound of a heart-seine.

heart-of-the-earth (här't'qv-thë-erth'), n. The plant self-heal, Brunnella vulgaris.

heart-pea (här'tpë), n. Same as heartseed.

heart-quake (här't'kwäk), n. Trembling of the heart; fearfulness.

It did the Grecians good to see; but heart-quakes shook the joints.

Chapman, Iliad, vii. 187.

He had been the safety of his subordinates in many an hour of danger and heart-quake.

Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, p. 12.

heartrending (här't'ren'ding), a. Overpowering with anguish; deeply afflictive; very distressing.

heart-robbing (här't'rob'ing), a. 1. Depriving of heart or thought; ecstatic.

A melting pleassance ran through every part,
And me revived with heart-robbing gladness.

Spenser.

2. Stealing the heart or affections; winning.

Drawn with the power of a heart-robbing eye. Spenser.

heart-root, n. [Early mod. E. also hartroote, < ME. herterote (= Dan. hjerterod = Sw. hjerterod, innermost heart); < heart + root.] The object of one's deepest love; a sweetheart.

Ever alacke, and woe is mee!

Here lyes my sweete hart-root.

Old Robin of Portingale (Child's Ballads, III. 39).

Pray for me, mine own heart-root in the Lord.

J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 178.

heart-rot (här't'rot), n. A disease which produces a decay in the center or heart of trees, caused by the penetration of the mycelia of various fungi which attack the tree either at the root or above ground. As the decay is at the center of the tree, the work of destruction may go on for years before the tree shows any outward sign of disease. It usually attacks old trees, and may be produced by injudicious pruning which allows the entrance of the fungi.

heart-scald (här't'skald), n. Heartburn; figuratively, a feeling of shame or aversion. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Tho' cholic or the heart-scald tease us, . . .
It masters a' sic fell diseases.

Ferguson, Caller Water.

I put on a look, my lord, . . . that suld give her a heart-scald of walking on such errands.

Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, xiv.

heart's-ease, heartsease (härts'ëz), n. [< ME. hertes ese (two words), in def. 1.] 1. Ease of heart; tranquillity of mind. Heart's-ease.

I myght neuer be in hertes ese till I hadde yow seyn.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 478.

What infinite heart's ease must kynges neglect,
That private men enjoy! Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1.

2. In bot.: (a) A popular and poetic name of plants of the genus Viola, especially V. tricolor, the pansy, and V. lutea, the common yellow violet of Europe. See pansy and violet. The name appears to have been transferred to these plants from the wallflower, Cheiranthus cheiri, originally classed with the violets, being first used in the sense of "cordial" for a medicine prepared from violets, supposed to be good for troubles of the heart. (b) In some parts of the United States, the common periscary, peachwort, lady's-thumb, or smartweed, Polygonum Persicaria.

heartseed (här't'sëd), n. A general name of plants of the genus Cardiospermum (of which name it is a translation), but more especially of C. Halicacabum, a beautiful vine well known in cultivation, which in the United States has received the appropriate name of balloon-vine, from the large, triangular, inflated fruit. See balloon-vine. The genus takes its name from the white heart-shaped scar which marks the attachment of the seed. It belongs to the natural order Sapindaceae, or soap-family. There are about 15 species, chiefly natives of tropical America, but the C. Halicacabum and two other species have a wider distribution. The names heart-pea and winter-cherry are also given to these plants. In the Moluccas the seeds are cooked and eaten as a vegetable. They are also used in some countries as a remedy for lumbago. The mucilaginous root is a laxative and diuretic, and is used in cases of rheumatism.

heart-seine (här't'sën), n. A weir with a heart-shaped inclosure or pound, which will fish however the tide may run. [Narragansett Bay.]

heart-service (här't'sër'vis), n. Service prompted by the heart; especially, zealous service to God; sincere devotion.

We should be slow . . . to deny the truth, force, and value of the heart-service which they [Dissenters] may and do render, and render with affectionate humility, to their Father and their God.

Gladsone, Gleanings, I. 67.

heart-shake (här't'shāk), n. A defect in timber consisting in cracks extending from the pith outward.

In timber having much heart-shake, there is certain to be considerable waste in its conversion, especially if we wish to reduce the log into plank and board.

Laetli, Timber, p. 25.

heart-shaped (hărt'shăpt), a. Shaped like the human heart; especially, having the conventional figure of a heart—that is, an oval figure obtusely pointed at one end, with a corresponding indentation in the other; cordate; cordiform: applied in botany to leaves, fruits, etc. In the case of leaves the base is often alone considered, lanceolate or linear leaves being often called heart-shaped. See emulate.

Heart-shaped Figure.

heart-shell (hărt'shel), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Isocardidae or Glossidae, Isocardia cor: so called from the heart-shaped contour of the valves when viewed from the front. The surface is covered with dark reddish-brown epidermis; there are two parallel primary teeth in the right valve, and in the left the large outer tooth is indented and the others are thin and lamellar; there is a well-developed lateral tooth. The heart-shell inhabits European seas, and is locally abundant, chiefly on sandy bottoms. By means of the foot it can fix itself firmly in the sand. It is used to some extent for food. Also called foolscap, heart-cockle, and heart-steel.

heart-sick (hărt'sik), a. [Cf. AS. heartsœc (= Dan. hertesyg), in lit. sense (L. cardiacus), < heorte, heart, + sœc, sick.] 1. Sick at heart; deeply afflicted or depressed.

I am sick still; heart-sick.—Pisanio,
I'll now taste of thy drug.

Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2.
Chatham heart-sick of his country's shame!

Cowper, Tale, ii. 244.

2. Indicating or expressive of heart-sickness.

The breath of heart-sick groans. Shak., R. and J., iii. 3.

heart-sickening (hărt'sik'ning), a. Tending to make the heart sick or depressed.

heart-sickness (hărt'sik'nes), n. Sadness of heart; depression of spirits.

heart-sinking (hărt'sing'king), n. Despondency; discouragement. Moore.

heart-snakeroot (hărt'snăk'rôt), n. The wild ginger, Asarum Canadense. Also called Canada snakeroot.

heartsome (hărt'sum), a. [< heart + -some.] 1. Inspiring with heart or courage; exhilarating.

Ye heartsome Choristers (redbreasts), ye and I will be Associates, and, unscared by blustering winds,
Will chant together. Wordsworth, Prelude, vii.

2. Merry; cheerful; lively.

At fifty-one she was a bright-eyed, handsome, heartsome soul to look upon, with a maternal manner and the laugh of a girl. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 127.

heart-sore (hărt'sôr), a. and n. [Early mod. E. hartsore; < ME. hertesor, earlier heortesar; < heart + sore.] I. a. 1. Sore or grieved at heart.—2. Proceeding from a sore or grieved heart.

To be in love, where scorn is bought with groans, Coy looks with heart-sore sighs. Shak., T. G. of V., i. 1.

II. † n. Soreness of the heart; grief.

His only heart-sore and his only foe.

Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 2.

heart-spoon (hărt'spôn), n. [< ME. hertespon; < heart + spoon.] 1. The depression in the breast-bone; also, the breast-bone.

Ther shyeren shaftes upon sheeldes thikke;
He feeleth thurgh the herte-spoon the prikke.

Chaucer, Knights Tale, l. 1748.

I will whet my dagger on his heart-spoon that refuses to pledge me! Scott, Kenilworth, xx.

2. The navel. [Prov. Eng.] heart-steel (hărt'stêl), n. Same as heart-shell.

heart-stirring (hărt'stêr'ing), a. Arousing or moving the heart; inspiring; exhilarating.

heartstrings (hărt'stringz), n. pl. Nerves or tendons supposed to brace and sustain the heart; hence, strongest affections; most intense feelings of any kind.

If I do prove her haggard,
Though that her jesses were my dear heart-strings,
I'd whistle her off, and let her down the wind.
Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

So may thy heart-strings hold thy heart, as thou
This more than heart of mine.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 77.

To break the heartstrings of. See break.

heart-struck (hărt'struk), a. 1. Struck to the heart; shocked with fear or grief; dismayed.

Adam at the news

Heart-struck, with chilling gripe of sorrow stode.
Milton, P. L., xi. 264.

2. Fixed in the heart; ineradicable.

Kent. But who is with him?
Gent. None but the fool; who labours to out-jest
His heart-struck injuries. Shak., Lear, iii. 1.

heart-swelling (hărt'swel'ing), a. Causing the heart to swell; rankling in the heart.

Through proud ambition and heart-swelling hate.

Spenser.

heart-trefoil (hărt'trê'foil), n. The spotted medic, Medicago maculata: so called both from its obcordate leaflets and from the somewhat heart-shaped purple or flesh-colored spot on each leaflet. Also called heart-clover, heart-leaf.

heart-urchin (hărt'êr'chin), n. A heart-shaped sea-urchin; any spatangoid. Also called mermaid's-head.

heart-wheel (hărt'hwêl), n. Same as heart-cam.

heart-whole (hărt'hôl), a. 1. Not in love, or not deeply affected by that passion.

Cupid hath clapped him o' the shoulder; but I'll warrant him heart-whole. Shak., As You Like It, iv. 1.

2. Having unbroken spirits or good courage. [Prov. Eng.]

Ay, he is weak; but yet he's heart-whole.

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iii. 5.

heart-wood (hărt'wûd), n. The central wood in the trunk of an exogenous tree; duramen.

The innermost layers of heart-wood contain 14 per cent. of pitch. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 680.

hearty (hărt'ti), a. and n. [Early mod. E. harty; < ME. harty, accom. of older ME. hertly, hertely, heartly: see heartily, a.] I. a. 1. Influenced by or proceeding from the heart; heartfelt; sincere; zealous: as, to be hearty in support of a project; a hearty welcome; a hearty laugh.

I shall aske theym forgiveness in as herty wyse as I can. English Gilde (E. E. T. S.), p. 415.

David was a "man after God's own heart," so termed because his affection was hearty towards God.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 1.

Our salutations were very hearty on both sides.

Addison, Spectator, No. 269.

2. Full of health; exhibiting strength; sound; strong; healthy: as, a hearty man.

Oak and the like tree hearty timber, being strong in all positions, may be better trusted in cross and transverse work. Sir H. Wotton, Elem. of Architecture.

I'm devilish glad to see you, my lad; why, my prince of charioteers, you look as hearty! Sheridan, The Rivals, i. 1.

"How is Bessie? You are married to Bessie?" "Yes, miss; my wife is very hearty, thank you."

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxi.

3. Adapted for, affording, using, or requiring strong or abundant nourishment: as, hearty food; a hearty dinner; a hearty eater or appetite.

The journey and the sermon enabled them . . . to do ample justice to Rachel's cold fowl, ham, pastry, and cake; and again and again she pressed to be hearty.

Gleaner, I. 335. (Jamieson.)

So Philomédès . . . stoops at once,

And makes her hearty meal upon a dunce. Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 86.

4. Bold; courageous.

Withoutyn the helpe and the hondes of herty Achilles.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 8854.

Essay, that hearty prophet, confirmeth the same.

Latimer, Works (Farker Soc.), I. 356.

As the old Roman Soldiers were forbidden marriage while they received pay, lest their domestic interests should abate their courage, so the Celibate of the Clergy was strictly enjoined to make them more useful and hearty for this design. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. ii.

=Syn. 1. Hearty, Cordial, Sincere; real, unfeigned, unaffected, heartfelt, earnest, ardent, eager. Hearty means having the heart in a thing, warmly interested in favor of something, and acting so as to show this feeling; proceeding straight from the heart, and manifested outwardly. Cordial is rather applied to feelings cherished or felt in the heart, heartfelt, or the outward expression of such feelings: as, cordial love; cordial hatred; cordial desires. Sincere means devoid of deceit or pretense, implying that the sentiments and the outward expression of them are in consonance.

How many a message would he send,
With hearty prayers that I should mend. Swift.

He . . . with looks of cordial love,
Hung over her enamour'd. Milton, P. L., v. 12.

Weak persons cannot be sincere.

La Rochefoucauld (trans.).

2. Active, vigorous, robust, hale.

II. n. A seaman's familiar form of address: as, come here, my hearties.

heart-yarn (hărt'yărn), n. A soft yarn in the center of a rope.

hearty-hale (hărt'ti-hāl), a. Good for the heart.

Sound Savorie, and Bazil hartie-hale.

Spenser, Muioptimos, l. 198.

heat (hêt), n. [< ME. heete, hete, < AS. hætu, hæto, also hæte (= OS. hêt = OFries. hête = OHG. heizi = Sw. heta = Dan. hede), heat, < hât, hot; see hot.] The D. LG. hitte = OHG. hizza, MHG. hizze = Teel. hiti, heat, and Goth. heitô, fever, are from the same ult. root.] 1. A sensation of the kind produced by close proximity to fire. The sensation of heat is commonly described as opposite in character to that of cold; but, strictly considered, this opposition lies not so much in these sensations themselves as in their causes and associations. Like cold, the sensation of heat probably resides only in special points of the skin, the points sensitive to heat being different in location from those which are sensitive to cold.

2. That condition of a material body which is capable of producing the sensation of heat; in physics, the corresponding specific form of energy, consisting in an agitation of the molecules of matter, and measured by the total kinetic energy of such agitation. See energy, T. Heat is of two kinds—heat proper, resident in a body, and radiant heat, which, from the physical point of view, is not heat at all, but, like light, a form of wave-motion projected by the vibrations of the luminiferous ether. Heat was formerly believed to be caused by an indestructible material fluid, called caloric. It is now known to be not a substance, but the energy of molecular motion, consisting, in the case of a gas, of nearly uniform rectilinear motions, with sudden changes of direction and velocity when the molecules come near enough to one another; in the case of a liquid, of irregular wanderings of its molecules; and in the case of a solid, of orbital or oscillatory motions. This motion entirely ceases only at the absolute zero point. The temperature is in fact nothing but the amount of heat per molecule. The effects of absorbed heat upon a body are: (1) Increase of temperature—that is, increase of the heat of each molecule. To a limited extent this can be measured by the senses, but more accurately by thermometers (see thermometer), the thermopile, etc. (2) Expansion, or increase of volume (see expansion). (3) Change of state, as of a solid to a liquid (see fusion and liquefaction), or of a liquid to a gas (see vaporization). Thus, to transform ice at 0° C. into water (melt it), or water at 100° C. into vapor or steam, a large amount of heat is required. This heat disappears as sensible heat, and is said to become latent. Latent heat, however, is a misleading term, for it is not true that heat is latent as such, but only that so much heat-energy has been expended in changing the position of the molecules and overcoming their mutual attractions. If the process is reversed, this latent heat becomes sensible, as, for example, when steam is condensed in a steam-radiator. Heat also produces electrical effects (see electricity), and is instrumental in initiating chemical changes. Heat may be transmitted from one place to another—(1) By convection (see convection), when the hot body is itself moved, as in heating by hot air conveyed in flues, or by hot water carried in pipes. (2) By conduction (see conduction), where the heat travels slowly through the mass of the body, as when one end of an iron bar is thrust into the fire and the other end gradually becomes heated. In this case it is the molecular motion of the iron which is propagated. (3) By radiation (see radiation). When heat was believed to be a substance, the radiation of heat was explained, in a manner analogous to the abandoned emission-theory of light (see light), as the actual transfer of the heat-fluid itself; now, however, radiant heat is known to be the energy of heat transferred to the luminiferous ether (see ether), which fills all space and also pervades all bodies. The hot body sets the ether-particles in vibration, and this vibratory motion, in the form of waves, travels in all directions and with a velocity of about 186,000 miles per second. If this radiant heat impinges upon a body, part of it may be absorbed, or, in other words, the molecules of the body may themselves be set in motion by the ether-waves. There is no essential difference between radiant heat and light, both being forms of radiant energy (see energy), the ether-waves differing intrinsically among themselves in wave-length only, and thus producing different effects, heating, luminous, and chemical, in the bodies upon which they impinge, according to the nature of these bodies. The rays whose heating effect is generally the greatest are of greater wave-length than those which most affect the eye (light-rays), and have longer periods of vibration. Like light-rays, they may be reflected, refracted, diffracted, and polarized. The quantity of heat of a body, or the amount of heat-energy which a body gains or loses in passing through a given range of temperature, is measured in thermal units (see heat), that is, by the quantity of water which it would raise through 1° C. (or 1° F.); it is given by the product of its weight into the number expressing the range in temperature multiplied by the specific heat. In ordinary speech heat and temperature are not distinguished. See temperature.

Heat is a very brisk agitation of the insensible parts of the object, which produces in us that sensation from whence we denominate the object hot: so what in our sensation is heat, in the object is nothing but motion. Locke, Elem. of Nat. Phil., xi.

Since heat can be produced, it cannot be a substance; and since whenever mechanical energy is lost by friction there is a production of heat, . . . we conclude that heat is a form of energy. Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, xciii.

In the strictest modern scientific language . . . the word heat is used to denote something communicable from one body or piece of matter to another.

Sir William Thomson, Encyc. Brit., XI. 555.

3. In ordinary use, a sensibly high temperature, as the warmth of the sun, or of the body.

Mwen of Nubye ben Cristene: but thei ben blake as the Mowres, for grete Hete of the Sonne.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 46.

Thei were sette vnder the hawethorn in the shadowe by the broke, and let their horse pasture down the medowes while the heete was so grete, for it was a-boute mydday. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), li. 522.

When she walketh asper for her pleasure, or to catch her a heat in the cold mornings.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 248.

4. A heating, as of a piece of iron to be wrought by a blacksmith, or of a mass of metal to be melted in a furnace; an exposure to intense heat.

A heat, it may be noted, is the time occupied between charging the pig-iron and drawing the last ball of malleable iron from the furnace, and is generally of about 1½ hour in duration.

W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 266.

The forging of a tool should be formed in as few heats as possible, for steel deteriorates by repeated heating.

J. Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 220.

A field bakery of this kind can deliver 17,928 loaves of bread for nine heats, each loaf forming two rations.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII 246.

Hence—5. Violent action; high activity; intense and uninterrupted effort: as, to do a thing at a heat.

With many a cruel hete

Gan Troilus upon his helm to bete.

Chaucer, Troilus, v. 1761.

fell was the fight, foining of speires,
Miche harme, in that hete, happit to falle.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 10237.

Dryden, I suspect, was not much given to correction, and indeed one of the great charms of his best writing is that everything seems struck off at a heat, as by a superior man in the best mood of his talk.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 64.

Especially—(a) A single course in a horse-race or other contest.

On the ninth of October next will be run for upon Coleshill Heath, in Warwickshire, a plate of six guineas value, 8 heats, by any horse, mare, or gelding, that hath not won above the value of 5*l*.

Adv. quoted in Spectator, No. 173.

As for "Manfred," the two first acts are the best; the third so so; but I was blown with the first and second heats.

Byron, to Murray.

(b) A division of a race or contest when the contestants are too numerous to run at once, the race being finally decided by the winners (or winners and seconds) of each division running a final race or heat.

6. Indication of high temperature, as the condition or color of the body or part of the body; redness; high color; flush.

It has raised animosities in their hearts, and heats in their faces.

A sudden flush of wrathful heat

Fired all the pale face of the Queen.

Tennyson, Guinevere.

7. Vehemence; rage; violence; excitement; animation; fervency; ardor; zeal: as, the heat of battle or of argument; the heat of passion or of eloquence.

'Tis strange

That you should deal so peevishly: beshrew you,

You have put me in a heat.

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, III. 2.

These Indians of Guam did speak of her [an Acapulco ship] being in sight of the Island while we lay there, which put our Men in a great heat to go out after her.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 303.

8. Sexual desire or excitement in animals, especially in the female, corresponding to rut in the male; the period or duration of such excitement: as, to be in heat.—Absorption of heat. See absorption.—Animal heat. See animal.—Atomic or molecular heats of bodies. See atomic.—Black heat, the condition of metal heated, but not enough to affect its color.—Black-red heat, the condition of metal heated so as to begin to be luminous by itself.—Blood-red heat. See blood-red.—Bottom heat, heat at or rising from the bottom; specifically, in hort., heat communicated beneath the roots of plants, as by fermenting and decomposing substances placed under them, or by running flues or pipes under them.—Capacity for heat. See capacity.—Dark heat. See def. 2 and dark1.—Dead heat, in racing, a heat in which the contestants cross the line at exactly the same time, neither one winning.—Diffusion of heat. See diffusion.—Distribution of heat. See distribution.—Evection of heat. See evection.—Heat of combination, the heat evolved or produced by the chemical combination of two bodies, divided by the amount of heat required to heat one degree a mass of water whose ratio to the mass of the compound is equal to that of the molecular weight of water to the molecular weight of the compound.—Latent heat. See def. 2.—Mechanical or dynamic equivalent of heat. See equivalent.—Prickly heat, an eruption of minute papules attended with a prickly itching; lichen tropicus; loosely, any papular eruption.—Red heat, white heat. (a) States of metals, and, to a limited extent, of some non-metallic substances, as carbon, at high but not definitely ascertained temperatures, in which they radiate a reddish or (when heated still higher) a much whiter light. These are especially noticeable in practice in the case of iron, which at a "full red heat" becomes thoroughly malleable, and at a "white heat" assumes a more or less pasty condition (which continues through a large range of temperature), and can be welded. Hence—(b) A state of strong and one of overpowering feeling; states of strong and of most intense passion, eagerness, or other emotion.—Sensible heat. See def. 2.—Specific heat, the number of heat-units required to raise the unit of mass of a given substance through 1° of temperature. For solids and liquids water is taken as the standard—that is, its specific heat is unity. For gases either water or air is taken. The specific heat measures the heat-capacity of different bodies, or the amount of heat they absorb or give out in passing through a certain range of temperature. (See calorimetry.) The product of the specific heats of the different elements into their atomic weights is found to be nearly a constant quantity (about 6); this product is called the atomic heat.

The Specific Heat of a body is the ratio of the quantity of heat required to raise that body one degree to the quantity required to raise an equal weight of water one degree.

Clark Maxwell, Heat, p. 66.

The heat of the day, the period of highest temperature of the day; the part of the day when the temperature is oppressive.—Welding heat, in metal, that heat at which iron begins to burn with vivid sparks.—White heat. See red heat, above.

Shak., K. John, iv. 1.

Nebuchadnezzar . . . commanded that they should heat the furnace seven times more than it was wont to be heat.

Dan. iii. 19 (ed. 1611).

2. To make feverish; stimulate; excite: as, to heat the blood.

2 Lord. Thou art going to Lord Timon's feast.

Apm. Ay; to see meat fill knives, and wine heat fools.

Shak., T. of A., i. 1.

Where bright Sol, that heat

B. Jonson, Masque of Blackness.

3. To warm with emotion, passion, or desire; rouse into action; animate; encourage.

That on me hette, that othir dede me colde.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, I. 145.

A noble emulation heats your breast.

Dryden.

Milton had heated his imagination with the Fight of the Gods in Homer, before he entered upon this Engagement of the Angels.

Addison, Spectator, No. 333.

4. To run a heat over, as in a race.

You may ride us,

With one soft kiss, a thousand furlongs, ere

With spur we heat an acre.

Shak., W. T., I. 2.

II. intrans. To grow warm or hot; come to a heated condition, from the effect either of something external or of chemical action, as in fermentation or decomposition.

The first machines constructed heated too much.

S. P. Thompson, Dynamo-Elect. Mach., p. 113.

heat-apoplexy (hêt'ap'ô-plek-si), n. Sunstroke.

heat-economizer (hêt'ë-kon'ë-mi-zër), n. A device by which the steam in a steam-engine or the hot air in an air-engine is cooled, causing it to impart its heat to a metallic body, which stores up the heat and imparts it in turn to the next charge of steam or air, thus materially reducing the waste of heat; a regenerator.

heat-engine (hêt'en'jin), n. An engine which transforms heat into mechanical work.

heater (hê'tër), n. One who or that which heats.

Camphire swallowed in, in the dose of a very few grains, a great heater of the blood.

Boyle, Works, V. 104.

Specifically—(a) A furnace, stove, or other device for heating, drying, or warming buildings, rooms, drying-houses, fruit-evaporators, or parts of machines, as the calendaring-rolls of a paper-mill. (b) A small mass of cast-iron designed to be heated and then placed in a hollow flat-iron or in a coffee-pot, to heat the iron or keep the coffee hot. (c) In a sugar-making plant, a pan used for the first heating of the cane-juice or syrup; a heating-pan.

heater-car (hê'tër-kär), n. A railroad-car constructed for the transportation in winter of fruits, vegetables, and other perishable products. Car-Builder's Dict.

heater-plate (hê'tër-plät), n. In an oil-lamp exposed to cold, a device to conduct the heat of the flame down to the oil-reservoir, in order to keep the oil from congealing. Car-Builder's Dict.

heater-shaped (hê'tër-shäpt), a. Shaped like the heater of a smoothing-iron; triangular; having one of the sides straight and the two others, which are equal and the counterparts of each other, curved. See heater (b).

The small heater-shaped shield. Encyc. Brit., XI. 692.

heat-factor (hêt'fak'tör), n. The thermodynamic function; the integral of the reciprocal of the temperature relatively to the heat expended.

heat-fever (hêt'fê'vër), n. Fever (pyrexia) caused by too great exposure to heat; thermic fever (a form of sunstroke).

heat-focus (hêt'fô'kus), n. See focus.

heath (hêth), n. [ME. hethe, heeth, heth, < AS. hæth = OD. heyde = MLG. heide, hede =

OHG. heida, MHG. G. heide, a heath, also, as exclusively in D. heide, the plant so called, = Ice. heidr = Sw. hed = Dan. hede, a heath, = Goth. haitthi, a heath, waste, = W. coed, a wood, = L. cœtum in bucetum, a pasture for cows (bos, a cow). The orig. sense is 'open, uncultivated land'; the plant is so named from growing on such land; cf. heather. Hence heathen, q. v.] 1. Open, uncultivated land; a desert tract of land; specifically, in Great Britain, an uncultivated tract of heathy or shrubby land, usually of a desolate character.

Some woods of oranges, and heaths of rosemary, will smell a great way in the sea. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 884.

Their stately growth, though bare,

Stands on the blasted heath. Milton, P. L., l. 615.

O Caledonia! stern and wild,

Meet nurse for a poetic child!

Land of brown heath and shaggy wood.

Scott, L. of L. M., v. 12.

Comes a vapour from the margin, blackening over heath and hold.

Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

2. A plant of the genus Erica, or, by extension, of the genus Calluna; any plant of the family Ericaceæ, called by Lindley heathworts. The species of Erica are widely distributed throughout Europe and the Mediterranean region, but are most abundant in South Africa, where they cover thousands of acres and constitute one of the principal forms of vegetation. The two best-known European species are E. cinerea, Scotch heather or fine-leaved heath, and E. tetralix, the cross-leaved heath. (See cut under Ericaceæ.) The nearly allied genus Calluna, having only a single species (C. vulgaris, is more commonly called heather or heath. (See cut under Calluna.) In Great Britain heath or heather covers large tracts of waste land, and is used to thatch houses and to make brooms, and in some places for making beds. Sheep, goats, and cattle feed upon it, and bees extract a finely flavored honey from the flowers. The young shoots and flowers are said to have been formerly employed in the manufacture of beer. The species of southern Europe, Erica arborea, attains considerable size, and is called the tree-heath. From the wood of this species, and especially from that of another species of southern Europe, E. mediterranea, are made most of the so-called briar-wood pipes, or briar tobacco-pipes. The moor-heaths belong to a section of the genus Erica called Gypsocalix by Don, and have somewhat different flowers and a different aspect. They are very beautiful plants, and inhabit moors and calcareous districts. The Cantabrian, Irish, or Saint Daboc's heath is a plant of a different genus of the heath family, Daboecia polifolia. It is chiefly a native of Ireland, but is also found in western France, northern Spain, and the Azores. It is a dwarf, bushy, evergreen shrub, grows in dense tufts, and has racemes of purple flowers. It is also called Irish-heath. The sea-heath, Frankenia laevis, is a low, heath-like maritime shrub inhabiting the European coasts. See Frankenia.

3. One of several small butterflies of different genera. The large heath is Erinophila tithonus; the small, Canonympha pamphilus.

heath-bell (hêth'bel), n. The flower of the heath, especially of Erica tetralix or E. cinerea. Also called heather-bell.

For heath-bell, with her purple bloom,

Supplied the bonnet and the plume.

Scott, L. of the L., III. 5.

heathberry (hêth'ber'î), n.; pl. heathberries (-iz). [ME. not found; AS. hæthberige, bilberry (?), < hæth, heath, + berige, berie, berry.] Same as crowberry.

heath-bird (hêth'berd), n. Same as heathcock or heath-hen.

heath-clad (hêth'klad), a. Clothed or crowned with heath.

Sleeping on the heath-clad hill.

J. Cunningham, Day, A Pastoral.

heath-cock (hêth'kok), n. The male black grouse. See blackcock.—Black and spotted heath-cock. Same as Canada grouse (which see, under grouse).—Ruffed heath-cock. Same as ruffed grouse (which see, under grouse).

heath-corn (hêth'körn), n. The buckwheat, Polygonum Fagopyrum.

heathcup (hêth'kup), n. The plant Artanema fimbriatum, natural order Scrophulariaceæ, an erect herb with opposite leaves, native of the East Indies and Australia, and cultivated for its large blue flowers, which are disposed in racemes at the ends of the branches.

heath-cypress (hêth'si'pres), n. An alpine and subalpine species of club-moss, Lycopodium alpinum, found in suitable situations throughout Europe: so called from its resembling a miniature cypress-tree, and growing on heathy ground.

heath-egger (hêth'eg'er), n. A bombycid moth, Lasiocampa callunæ.

heathen (hê'then or -þen), n. and a. [ME. hethen, < AS. hætian, n. (= OS. hêdian = OFries. hêthen = OD. heyden, D. heiden = MLG. heidene, heiden = OHG. heidan, MHG. heide, G. heiden, heide = Ice. heidinn = Sw. Dan. heden, a heathen, = *Goth. haitheins, m., haitthnô, f.), a heathen; orig. and prop. an adj., 'of the heath or open country' (but not found in this sense), < hæth, E. heath (= Goth. haiþi, etc.), open country, being equiv. to LL. paganus, heathen, lit. 'of the country': see pagan. The resemblance to Gr. ἔθνα, ἔθνη, gentiles, 'heathen,' pl. of ἔθνος, a nation, is slight and accidental.] I. n. sing. and pl. 1. One of a race, nation, or people that does not acknowledge the God of the Bible, or such races, nations, or peoples collectively, especially when uncivilized or uncultured; one who is not a Jew, Christian, or Mohammedan; a pagan.

So many were dead and wounded of cristin and hethen that the felde was all couered, so that oon myght not come to a-nother but ouer deed cors.

Merrin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 596.

The Russian Ambassador still at Court behav'd himselfe like a clowne, compar'd to this civil heathen.

Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 24, 1682.

He [Geraint] . . . fell

Against the heathen of the Northern Sea,
In battle, fighting for the blameless King.

Tennyson, Geraint.

2. In Scrip., with the definite article, the gentiles; those nations or peoples that did not acknowledge Jehovah, the God of the Jews, as the true God; hence, idolaters, from the prevalence of idolatry among them.

Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance.

Ps. ii. 8.

Go, and the Holy One
Of Israel be thy guide
To what may serve his glory best, and spread his name
Great among the heathen round.

Milton, S. A., l. 1430.

3. Any irreligious, rude, barbarous, or unthinking person or class: as, the heathen at home. [The plural, in all senses, is usually heathen; but in many instances, especially with reference to individuals, the regular plural form, heathens, is used.]

II. a. Pagan; gentile: as, heathen superstitions or customs.

Til it [a child] be crystened in Crystes name, and conformed of the bishop,

It is hethene as to heuenward, and heelpless to the soule,
Hethene is to mene after heth and vntiled erthe.

Piers Plowman (B), xv. 450.

The heathen emperor thinks it absurd that Christian baptism should be able to cleanse from gross sins, while it cannot remove a wart, or gout, or any bodily evil.

Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, III. § 9.

= Syn. See gentile, n.

heathendom (hē'thēn-dum), n. [< ME. heathendom, < AS. hæthendūm (= D. heidendom = MLG. heidendum = OHG. heidantūm, MHG. heidentūm, G. heidentum = Sw. Dan. heidendom), < hæthen, heathen, + -dōm, E. -dom.] 1. The state or condition of a heathen; heathenism.

Degradation, pestilence, heathendom, and despair.

Kingley, Cheap Clothes and Nasty.

2. Those parts of the world in which heathenism prevails: opposed to Christendom.—3. Heathen nations or peoples regarded collectively.

heathenset, n. See heathensness.

heathenhood, n. [ME. hethenhod, hæthenhede; < heathen + -hood.] Heathendom.

Al this world is biheld mid hethenhode.

Old. Eng. Misc., p. 91.

heathenise, v. t. See heathenize.

heathenish (hē'thēn-ish), a. [*< ME. hethenish, < AS. hæthenisc (= D. heidensch = MLG. heidens, heidensch = OHG. heidanisch, MHG. heidensch, heidensch, G. heidensch = Sw. heidnisk = Odan. heydensk, hednisk, Dan. hedensk), < hæthen, heathen, + -isc, E. -ish.] 1. Of or pertaining to gentiles or pagans; characteristic of or practised by the heathen: as, heathenish rites.

When the apostles of our Lord and Saviour were ordained to alter the laws of heathenish religion, chosen they were, St. Paul excepted; the rest unschooled altogether, and unlettered men.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Under whatever disguise it [the classical drama] appeared, it was essentially heathenish: for, from first to last, it was mythological, both in tone and in substance.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., i. 228.

Hence—2. Uncivilized; uncultured; rude; savage; degraded; cruel.

Lod. There is a letter . . . imports
The death of Cassio to be undertook
By Roderigo.

Cas. Most heathenish and most gross!

Shak., Othello, v. 2.

That execrable Cromwell made a heathenish or rather inhuman edict against the Episcopal clergy.

South, Sermons.

heathenishly (hē'thēn-ish-li), adv. In a heathenish manner.

'Tis heathenishly done of 'em in my conscience, thou deserv'st it not.

Beau. and Fl., King and No King, i.

heathenishness (hē'thēn-ish-nes), n. The state or character of being heathenish.

The . . . heathenishness and profaneness of most play books.

Prynne, Histrio-Mastix, p. 913.

heathenism (hē'thēn-izm), n. [< heathen + -ism.] 1. Heathen systems of religion or morals; pagan practice or belief; paganism.

Julian attempted to set up preachers of heathenism, in opposition to those of Christianity.

Secker, Works, I. xli.

Heathenism partially, if not wholly, merged God in nature.

G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 26.

2. Heathenish manners or condition; the degraded or uncultured state of those who are uninfluenced by Christianity; barbarism; ignorance; irreligion: as, the heathenism of the slums.

heathenize (hē'thēn-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. heathenized, ppr. heathenizing. [< heathen + -ize.] To render heathen or heathenish. Also spelled heathenise.

The continuance of these unscriptural terms, without an exact application of them in sermons and catechisms, heathenizes all the common people, nay, and great numbers of not unlearned persons.

Account of Mr. Firmin's Religion (1698), p. 63.

heathenly, a. [< heathen + -ly.] Heathenish.

An heathenly Pagan.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 176.

heatheness (hē'thēn-nes), n. [Archaically heatheness (prob. regarded as analogous to noblesse and other abstract nouns with F. term. -esse); < ME. hethenesse, hæthenesse (for hethenesse*: cf. forgiveness for forgiveness*), < AS. hæthennes, < hæthen, heathen, + -nes, E. -ness.] 1. The state of being heathen.—2. The countries inhabited by heathens; heathendom. [Archaic.]

Therto hadde he riden, no man ferre,
As wel in Cristendom as in hethenesse.

Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., l. 49.

gef ony brother or sister deye in straunge cuntre, in cristendom or in hethenesse, the bretheren shollen . . . doun a messe of requiem for the soule.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 36.

Neither in Christendome, nor yet in heathennest, None hath see much good as he.

Ballad of King Arthur (Child's Ballads, I. 234).

heathenry (hē'thēn-ri), n. [< heathen + -ry.] 1. Heathenish rites and practices; heathen systems of religion or morals; heathenism.

Are you so besotted with your philosophy, and your heathenry, and your laziness, and your contempt for God and man, that you will see your nation given up for a prey, and your wealth plundered by heathen dogs?

Kingsley, Hypatia, vi.

In most places, even in the heart of Meccah, I met with debris of heathenry, proscribed by Mohammed.

R. F. Burton, El-Medinalah, p. 20.

2. The heathen; heathendom.

heathenship (hē'thēn-ship), n. [< heathen + -ship. Cf. MLG. heidenschop = OHG. heidinschaft, MHG. G. heidenschaft = Dan. heden-skab.] Heathenism.

But a higher importance attaches to a clause in the Northumbrian Priests' Laws, by which a person accused of the practice of any heathenship was bound to clear himself by the oath of compurgators, partly his kinsmen and partly native strangers.

N. and G., 7th ser., VI. 63.

heather (hē'thēr), n. [Formerly also hether, hather, and (dial.) hadder; < heath, open country, + -er; equiv. to heath, used, without term., as the name of the plant.] 1. Heath: especially applied to Calluna vulgaris, the common heather. It differs from the other true heaths in possessing astringent properties, and is employed by both fullers and dyers. See cut under Calluna.

Heath is the general or common name, whereof there is owne kind called hather, the other ling.

Norden, Surveiors Dialogue (1610).

They [Indian Brachmanni] lay upon the ground covered with skins, as the Redshanks doe on hadder, and dieted themselves sparingly.

Burton, Anat., of Mel., p. 542.

Come o'er the heather, come round him gither.

What'll be King but Charlie?

Patches bright of bracken green,
And heather black, that waved so high,
It held the copse in rivalry.

Scott, L. of the L., v. 3.

2. The crowberry, Empetrum nigrum. [Rare.]—3. A tweed or similar fabric, usually 56 inches wide, woven of heather-wool, and presenting a color-effect like that of heather. Also called heather mixture.—Silver heather, a moss, Polytrichum commune. See Polytrichum.—To set the heather on fire, to kindle disturbance; bring smoldering disaffection to a blaze.

It's partly that whilk has set the heather on fire e'en now.

Scott, Rob Roy, xxxv.

heather-ale (hē'thēr-āl), n. A traditional drink said to have been brewed in North Britain from the bells of heather.

heather-bell (hē'thēr-bel), n. Same as heath-bell.

'Tis sweet beneath the heather-bell
To live in autumn brown.

Leyden, Keeldar.

heather-bleat, heather-bleater (hē'thēr-blēt, -blē'tēr), n. [Sc. also (obs.) hetherbluter, hedderbluter; < heather (appar.) + bleat, bleater, in allusion to its cry. But the first element is an accom. of a different original, the word being variously otherwise manipulated as Sc. heron-bluter (as if involving heron), ern-bleater, earnbliter, yeru-bliter, -bluter (as if involving earn, eagle), E. dial. hammer-bleat (as if in allusion to hammering); the ME. forms not found; all ult. < AS. hæferblæte, hæferblæta, early AS. (Kentish) hæbreblæte, once erroneously hæfen-blæte, the name of a bird, glossing ML. bicoa and bugum (both words obscure: for bugum, see under fieldfare), lit. 'goat-bleater,' < AS. hæfer, a he-goat, buck (= L. caper: see cap-er), + blætan, bleat: see bleat.] Same as ern-bleater.

heather-claw (hē'thēr-clā), n. A dew-claw.

heather-grass (hē'thēr-grās), n. A species of grass, Triodia decumbens, common throughout Europe, growing on spongy, wet, cold soils, and of little economic importance. See Triodia. Also called heath-grass.

heather-lintie (hē'thēr-lin'ti), n. The meadow-pipit, Anthus pratensis. [Local, Eng.]

heather-peeper (hē'thēr-pē-pēr), n. The peewee or common sandpiper of Europe, Tringoides hypoleucos. [Local, Scotland.]

heather-wool (hē'thēr-wūl), n. Wool or worsted yarn made for knitting and other fancy work, partly-colored or mottled in various shades, and producing work of a mixed or speckled color thought to be like that of heather.

heathery¹ (hē'thēr-i), n.; pl. heatheries (-iz). [< heath + -ery.] A place where heaths grow; a house in which valuable heaths are cultivated.

heathery² (hē'thēr-i), a. Of, pertaining to, or resembling heather; abounding with heather; heathy.

The antler'd monarch of the waste
Sprang from his heathery couch in haste.

Scott, L. of the L., i. 2.

I found the house amid desolate heathery hills.

Emerson, English Traits, i.

heath-fowl (hē'th'foul), n. The moor-fowl, Lagopus scoticus. Montagu.

heath-grass (hē'th'grās), n. Same as heather-grass.

heath-hen (hē'th'hen), n. 1. The female heath-bird; the hen of the black grouse.

O'er the trackless waste
The heath-hen flutters, pious fraud! to lead
The hot pursuing spaniel far away.

Thomson, Spring, l. 700.

2. One of several American grouse, as the pinnated, ruffed, or Canada grouse. Also heath-cock. W. Wood, 1634; D. Denton, 1670. [Rare or archaic.]

heath-honeysuckle (hē'th'hun'i-suk-l), n. The name in Australia of a flowering shrub, Banksia serrata, from the large amount of honey its flowers secrete.

heath-pea (hē'th'pē), n. A tuber-bearing leguminous plant, Lathyrus macrorhizus (Orobos tuberosus). The tubers resemble peas, and are eaten boiled or baked. The plant is widely diffused throughout Europe. The name is said sometimes to be applied also to another vetch, Vicia sicula (Orobos atropurpureus).

heath-peat (hē'th'pēt), n. Peat from the surface-soil of places abounding in heather.

heath-poult (hē'th'pōlt), n. The pullet or young of the heath-bird.

heath-pout (hē'th'pout), n. Same as heath-poult.

heath-snail (hē'th'snāl), n. A kind of snail common in Great Britain, Helix ericetorum, ranging to the north of Scotland.

heath-throstle (hē'th'thros'tl), n. The ring-ouzel, Turdus torquatus. [Local, Eng.]

heathwort (hē'th'wērt), n. In Lindley's system, any plant of the heath family, Ericaceae: used chiefly in the plural. See cut under Ericaceae.

heathy (hē'thi), a. [< heath + -y.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of heath; covered or abounding with heath; adapted to the growth of heath: as, heathy land.

From its hill of heathy brown
The muirland streamlet hastens down.

J. Baillie.

O happy pleasure! here to dwell
Beside thee in some heathy dell.

Wordsworth, To a Highland Girl.

heating (hē'ting), p. a. Promoting warmth or heat; having the quality of imparting heat; stimulating; as, a heating medicine or diet.

heating-back (hē'ting-bak), n. A chamber at the back of a forge in which the air-blast is heated.

heatingly (hē'ting-li), adv. In a heating manner; so as to make or become hot or heated.

heating-pan (hē'ting-pan), n. 1. A pan for heating flaxseed and other seed from which oil is expressed.—2. The first pan in which sugar-cane juice or sugar-maple sap is heated, preparatory to dipping or evaporating.

heating-surface (hē'ting-sēr'fās), n. Same as fire-surface.

heating-tube (hē'ting-tüb), n. In a steam-boiler, a water-tube connecting at each end with a water-space, and directly exposed to the flame.

heatless (hē'tles), a. [heat + -less.] Destitute of heat; cold.

My blood lost, and limbs stiff; my embraces
Like the cold stubborn bark, hoarse, and heatless.
Fletcher, Mad Lover, iii.

Where Mars is seen his ruddy rays to throw Thro' heatless skies, that round him seem to glow.
Hughes, Ecstasy, st. 8.

heat-potential (hēt'pō'ten'shāl), n. The work performed by the disappearance of heat.

heat-regulator (hēt'reg'ū-lā-tor), n. A thermostat combined with some device for controlling the draft of a furnace and regulating the fire.

heat-spectrum (hēt'spek'trum), n. A spectrum of a thermal radiation, considered not with reference to its effect upon the eye, but with reference to its intrinsic energy or heating power. Wherever there is a visible spectrum there is a heat-spectrum, and these two are really one and the same: only, when we speak of the visible spectrum we mean that part of the whole spectrum which affects the eye, considering each part to have an intensity proportional to that effect; while the heat-spectrum is the real spectrum in its whole extent, including both the luminous and non-luminous rays, its intensity being everywhere proportional to its heating power.

heat-spot (hēt'spot), n. 1. A freckle.—2. A spot on the surface of the body at which the sensation of heat can be produced.

The relative number and arrangement of heat-spots and cold-spots is different for different areas of the skin.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 413.

heat-unit (hēt'ū-nit), n. The unit quantity of heat; the amount of heat required to raise 1 pound of water (also 1 kilogram, or 1 gram: see calory) through 1 degree of temperature. Thus, 1 pound of coal, upon combustion, yields about 13,500 heat-units—that is, heat enough to raise 13,500 pounds of water through 1° F.

Heat-units per hour abstracted in ice-making.
Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8780.

heaume (hōm), n. [OF, a helmet: see *helm*².] In medieval armor, a helm or helmet; specifically, a large helmet worn during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, usually over an inner defense, such as the coif of mail, or the basinet. It rested a, Heaume with ailettes, end of 13th century; b, Heaume, end of 14th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français.") upon the shoulders. The helm in some cases being free to move within it, and was worn only in battle. Its great weight led to the adoption of the armet, which adapted itself to the form of the head, and allowed of movement in all directions.

heautomorphism (hē-ā-tō-mōr'fizm), n. [Gr. ἐαυτοῦ, m., ἐαυτοῦ, f., ἐαυτοῦ, n., a gen. form, of himself, herself, itself (contr. of ἐο αὐτοῦ, etc.: ἐο, later ὄ = L. sui, of himself, etc. (see sui generis); αὐτοῦ, gen. of αὐτός, self (see auto-), + μορφή, form.] Automorphism.

Heautomorphism, in default of science, is ever the first resource of explanation; i. e., we judge of others by ourselves.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 257.

They are the model of those men whose honours
We heave our hands at when we hear recited.
Beau. and Fl., Captain, i. 3.

Rise, rise, and heave thy rosy head
From thy coral-paved bed.
Milton, Comus, l. 885.

The curious custom known as heaving: on Easter Monday the men heaved the women, i. e., lifted them off the ground and kissed them.
Bickerdyke, p. 241.

Especially—2. To lift with obvious effort; raise with exertion, as something heavy or resistant.

This shoulder was ordain'd so thick to heave;
And heave it shall some weight, or break my back.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 7.

3†. To lift (a child) at baptism; baptize; also, to be sponsor for.

Bot no sawle may thithen pas, Untyle it be cleaense all it fyrst was,
When he was heaven at fount-stane,
And hys crystandom thare had tane.
Hampole, Handlyng Synne.

4. To weigh; heft. [Prov. Eng.]—5. To cause to swell or bulge upward; raise above the former or the surrounding level: often with up.

The glittering finny swarms
That heave our friths and crowd upon our shores.

Heaves abroad his cares in one good sigh.
Browning, Ring and Book, l. 45.

9. To throw upward and outward; cast or toss with force or effort; hurl or pitch, as with aim or purpose; as, to heave a stone; to heave the lead. [Chiefly naut. and colloq.]

I escaped upon a butt of sack, which the sailors heaved overboard.
Shak., Tempest, ii. 2.

The ships at first grounded two or three miles from the shore, yet (through the Lord's great mercy) they were heaved by the seas near to the dry land.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 293.

10. In geol., to throw or lift out of its place: said of the intersection of two veins, or of that of a cross-course with another vein. When a displacement of one or the other is caused by the intersection, one vein is said to heave the other out of its regular position.

A vein may be thrown out on meeting another vein, in a line which approaches either towards its inclination or its direction. The Cornish miners use two different terms to denote these two modes of rejection; for the first case they say the vein is heaved, for the second it is started.
Ure, Dict., III. 300.

11. Naut., to draw or pull in any direction, as by means of a windlass or capstan: as, to heave a ship ahead (that is, to bring her forward, when not under sail, by means of a cable or other appliance); to heave up an anchor (to raise it from the bottom of the sea or elsewhere).—Hove apeak. See apeak.—To heave aback, to get (a ship) in such a position, by putting the helm down or hauling in the weather-braces, or both, that the wind acts on the forward surface of the sails.—To heave a cable short, to haul it in until the ship lies nearly over the anchor.—To heave a strain, to turn the capstan or windlass till the rope upon bears a strain with full force at the windlass.—To heave a vessel about, to put her on the other tack.—To heave a vessel down, to careen her for repairs by means of tackles from her masthead to the shore or to a bulk.

The ship also was so leaky that I doubted it would be necessary to heave her down at Batavia, which was another reason for making the best of our way to that place.
Cook, Voyages, II. iii. 7.

To heave in stays, in tacking, to bring (a ship's head) to the wind.—To heave out, to raise (the keel) out to the water by careening, in order to repair or clean it.—To heave the gorge. We passed through a large fleet of merchantmen hove-to under shelter of Cape de Gak.
Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, II. xxviii.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Hoist, lift, etc. See raise.

II. intrans. 1. To be raised, thrown, or forced up; rise; swell up; bulge out.

Where ground beares naturally store of chamoeks, the cheese that is made off from such ground the day-women cannot keep from heaving.
Aubrey's Wills, MS. Royal Soc., p. 300. (Halliwell.)

So high as heaved the tumid hills, so low Down sunk a hollow bottom broad and deep.
Milton, P. L., vii. 238.

It is of little use to expect clover as a permanent crop in wet soils, or those subject to heave by the annual winter frosts.
New Amer. Farm Book, p. 132.

2. To rise and fall with alternate motions, as the waves of the sea, the lungs in difficult or painful breathing, the earth in an earthquake, etc.

Dead calm in that noble breast
Which heaves but with the heaving deep.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xi.

The minister's . . . mind was . . . tossed to and fro on that stormy deep of thought, heaving forever beneath the conflict of windy dogmas.
O. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, xvii.

On the fourth [day] the wind fell, leaving the ship dismasted and heaving on vast billows.
R. L. Stevenson, Master of Ballantrae, ii.

3. To pant, as after severe exertion; labor.

He heaves for breath, which, from his lungs supply'd,
And fetch'd from far, distends his lab'ring side.
Dryden.

Crossing a certain heave of grass.
Geo. MacDonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock.

4. In mining, a dislocation or displacement of a part of a vein, in consequence of its intersection by another vein or cross-course, or by a simple slide, fracture, or jointing of the country-rock. But it occasionally happens that a vein is "hove" when there is no sign of a cross-vein or joint at the place where the continuity of the vein is broken.

Surface displacement has been termed the heave of a fault.
Geikie, Encyc. Brit., x. 303.

5. pl. A disease of horses. See heaves.—Heave of the sea, the power exerted by the swell of the sea in advancing, retarding, or changing the course of a vessel.
heaven (hev'n), n. [*Early mod. E. also heven; < ME. heven, < AS. heofon, heofen, hefon, earlier heben = OS. hebban = MLG. heven = Icel. hifinn, heaven. The Icel. form is more commonly himinn, mod. himin = Goth. himins, heaven, the same, but with different suffix -in, as OS. himil = OFries. himul = D. hemel = OHG. MHG. himel, G. himmel = Sw. Dan. himmel, heaven, also in OHG., D., Icel., etc., ceiling, canopy (so early AS. heben-hus, glossed by L. lacunar, ceiling), pointing to a prob. orig. meaning 'covering', represented by E. hamel, q. v. The forms with for b and those with m are prob. orig. identical, but the reason of the change is not clear. The word heaven is often erroneously explained as orig. the pp. of heave, the sky being regarded as that which is 'heaved' up; but the AS. hefen, hefen, pp. of hebban, heave, is very different phonetically from heofon, heaven, and the two words must be of different origin. This supposed relation of heaven to heave appears reversed and modified in the actual relation of lift, the air, the sky, with lift, raise.] 1. The expanse of space surrounding the earth, and appearing above and around us as a great arch or vault, in which the sun, moon, and stars seem to be set; the sky; the firmament; the celestial regions: often used in the plural.
Hit was neuer herd, as I hope, sith heuyn was o loft

'Tis very sweet to look into the fair
And open face of heaven, to breathe a prayer
Full in the smile of the blue firmament.
*Keats, Sonnet.

2. Sky as typical of climate; a zone or region.
From vases in the hall
Flowers of all heavens, and lovelier than their names, Grew side by side. Tennyson, Princess, ProL.
3. The celestial abode of immortal beings; the place or state of existence of blessed spirits beyond the sphere of or after departure from the earthly life. In Christian theology heaven is regarded as the region or state of endless happiness enjoyed by angels and faithful departed spirits in the immediate presence of God. The Hebrews supposed three heavens—the air, the stary firmament, and the abode of God. The Cabalists described seven heavens, each rising in happiness above the other, the highest being the abode of God and the most exalted angels. Hence, to be in the seventh heaven is to be supremely happy. The heaven of the Mohammedans is remarkable for the sensual delights it has in store for the faithful. The ancient Greeks and Latins regarded heaven as the abode of the greater gods; and the spirits of the great and good were supposed to find their place of bliss in the Elysian Fields (which see, under Elysian).
But zit there is a place that men cleepen the Scole of God, where he was wont to teche his Disciples, and tolde hem the Freytes of Hevene.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 114.

So God has greatly purpos'd. Cowper, Task, vi. 818.

heave-offering (hēv'of'ér-ing), n. In the Levitical law, a voluntary offering which when presented before the Lord was 'heaved' or elevated by the priest, and became the portion of the priests and their families. The term is also sometimes applied to offerings received for the priests but not actually heaved or elevated. Hence the Hebrew word terumah, which is rendered heave-offering 22 times, is elsewhere in the Old Testament rendered 'offering' (38 times), 'oblation' (19 times), 'gifts' (once, Prov. xxix. 4.), and 'is offered' (once, Ezek. xlviii. 12.). It is used of the tithes paid by the Levites to the priests (Num. xviii. 26-29), of offerings for the fabric, vessels, etc., of the tabernacle (Ex. xxv., xxxv., xxxvi., etc.), of territory reserved to the priests (Ezek. xlv. i, xlviii. 8-21), of the offering of a half-shekel or didrachma of atonement-money once a year (Ex. xxx. 13-16; compare Mat. xvii. 24), etc.

Thou shalt sanctify the wave of the wave offering, and the shoulder of the heave offering, which is waved, and which is heaved up, of the ram of the consecration, even of that which is for Aaron, and of that which is for his sons.
Ex. xxix. 27.

heaver (hē'vēr), n. One who or that which heaves or lifts. Specifically—(a) One of a class of men employed about docks to take goods from vessels: generally used in composition: as, coal-heaver. 3. In some Gnostic systems, a group of superhuman beings, angels, or divine emanations; in the systems of Basilides and Valentinus, the sphere of the Demiurge, sublunary, and lower than the ogdoad, or a title of the Demiurge himself. The Gnostic uses of the word were apparently developed from the idea of the seven planets or planetary heavens, or that of gods, spirits, or angels personifying, indwelling, ruling, or creating them; then, in a collective sense, it came to mean the whole sublunary sphere, or its ruler.

In the next lower sphere (below the Ogdoad, in the system of Basilides), called the hebdomad, or sphere of seven, is the second Archon, or Ruler, who is the God of the Jews, and who created all things below Him.

Ep. Chr. Wordsworth, Church History, I. 195.

A manner or custom peculiar to the Hebrews; specifically, an idiom, expression, or manner of speaking peculiar to the Hebrew tongue.

Milton . . . has infused a great many Latinisms, as well as Græcisms, and sometimes Hebraisms, into the language of his poem.

Addison, Spectator, No. 255.

2. The spirit and tendency regarded as especially characteristic of the Hebrew race, historically considered.

The uppermost idea with Hebraism is conduct and obedience. . . . Hebraism . . . and here is the source of its wonderful strength—has always been severely preoccupied with an awful sense of the impossibility of being at ease in Zion. . . . By alternations of Hebraism and Hellenism, of a man's intellectual and moral impulses, of the effort to see things as they really are, and the effort to win peace by self-conquest, the human spirit proceeds. . . . All which Protestantism . . . succeeded in clearly setting forth in words had the characters of Hebraism rather than of Hellenism. . . . Puritanism . . . was a reaction of Hebraism against Hellenism.

M. Arnold, Culture and Anarchy, iv.

2. The language spoken by the Hebrews, one of the northern or Canaanite divisions of the Semitic family of languages. It is the language of the books of the Old Testament, and became extinct as a vernacular tongue three or four centuries before the Christian era, but it is even now used for speaking and writing by well-educated Hebrews all over the world, and has an extensive modern literature.

And the Table above his Heved, that was a Fote and an half long, on the whiche the Title was written, in Ebreu, Grece, and Latyn, that was of Olyve.

Manderiville, Travels, p. 10.

Ezra, pressing on their hands, raised himself, and uttered in Hebrew the confession of the Divine Unity, which for long generations has been on the lips of the dying Israelite.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, lxx.

Epistle to the Hebrews, one of the books of the New Testament, addressed to Christians of Hebrew birth dwelling in Rome, or perhaps in Palestine or Alexandria. Its chief object is to present a parallel between the symbolism of the Old Testament dispensation and the life-work of Christ. The author is unknown—perhaps Barnabas, or less probably Apollos. The authorship has been often ascribed to the apostle Paul, but this view is contrary to the weight of authority of the early church, and is opposed by the mass of modern scholars. A probable date of composition is about A. D. 65. Abbreviated Heb.—Rabbinical or modern Hebrew, the language used by the rabbins in their writings. Its basis or body is the Hebrew and Chaldaic, with various alterations in the words of these two languages. They have borrowed freely from the Arabic, and the rest is composed of words chiefly from the Greek, some from the Latin, and others from the modern tongues.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Hebrews; Hebraic: as, the Hebrew language or rites.

The Hebrew liturgy, like others, has its transitions of litany, lyric, proclamation, dry statements, and blessing.

His thin cheek assumed a deadly hue,
And all the rose to one small spot withdrew:
They call'd it hectic; 'twas a fiery flush,
More fix'd and deeper than the maiden blush.

Crabbe, Works, I. 183.

2. Pertaining to or affected with such fever; feverish; consumptive: as, a hectic flush.

The hectic heat
Of Oswald's blood doubled their pulses' pace.

Sir W. Davenant, Gondibert, II. 5.

But for some years before its author's death it dwindled away so much, and fell into such an hectic state, that the few friends of it feared its decease was very near.

I. D. Israel, Calam. of Authors, I. 105.

Hectic infantile fever. See fever.

II. n. 1. A hectic fever; a wasting away, attended by heightened color.

Do it, England;

For like the hectic in my blood he rages,

And thou must cure me. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 3.

2. A hectic flush.

The poor Franciscan made no reply; a hectic of a moment pass'd across his cheek, but could not tarry—Nature seemed to have done with her resentments in him.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 10.

The coronal which autumn gives,

The brief, bright sign of ruin near,

The hectic of a dying year!

Whittier, Mogg Megone, II.

hectical (hek'ti-kal), a. [hectic + -al.] Same as hectic.

It grieved them nevertheless, nor was the less a fever for being hectical. Jos. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 100.

hectically (hek'ti-kal-i), adv. In a hectic manner; constitutionally; consumptively.

He was for some years hectically feverish.

Johnson, Ascham.

hectocotyle (hek'tō-kōt-il), n. Same as hectocotylus, 2.

hectocotylization (hek'tō-kōt'i-lī-zā'shon), n. [hectocotyliz (ed) + -ation.] The process or result of being hectocotylized; the state, quality, or condition of a hectocotylus: applied both to the modification of the arm of the male cephalopod, which converts it into a reproductive organ, and to the fertilization of the female by this means. Also spelled hectocotylisation.

hectocotylized (hek'tō-kōt-i-līz), a. [hectocotylus + -ize + -ed.] 1. Changed into a hectocotylus, as an arm of certain cephalopods.

The male Cephalopods are distinguished from the females by the asymmetry of their arms, one or more of which, on one side, are peculiarly modified, or hectocotylized.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 454.

2. Affected by a hectocotylus; impregnated, as a female cephalopod when she receives the detached male arm.

Also spelled hectocotylised.

hectocotylus (hek'tō-kōt'i-lus), n. [NL. (Cuvier, def. 1), < Gr. ἑκατόν (contr.), a hundred, + κότυλα, a small cup: see cotyle.] 1†. [cap.] In zool., a spurious genus of parasitic organisms, the same as the Trichocephalus of Delle Chiaje;

in reality, the detached male arm of a cephalopod, attached to the female, and mistaken for a parasite.—2. In biol., the metamorphosed reproductive arm of certain of the male cephalopods, as the argonaut, which becomes detached and is deposited within the mantle-cavity of the female for the purpose of conveying the sperm-cells to her. Also hectocotyle. See cut under Argonautida.

hectogram, hectogramme (hek'tō-gram), n. [F. hectogramme, < Gr. ἑκατόν (contr.), a hundred, + γράμμα, repr. F. gramme, E. gram: see gram.] In the metric system, a weight of 100 grams, or 1,543.2349 grains.

hectograph (hek'tō-gráf), n. [Gr. ἑκατόν (contr.), a hundred, + γράφειν, write.] A copying process in which the writing or drawing to be copied is made on smooth paper in aniline ink, and is then pressed upon a slab coated with gelatin, to which a part of the ink is thus transferred, and from which a number of duplicate impressions can be made; also, the special appliances, collectively, by means of which this is done. Also spelled hectograph. [Trade-name.]

hectograph (hek'tō-gráf), v. t. [hectograph, n.] To copy by means of a hectograph.

hectographic (hek'tō-gráf'ik), a. [hectograph + -ic.] Pertaining to or made with the hectograph.

hectoid (hek'toid), a. [hectic + -oid.] Of a hectic appearance; resembling hectic fever.

The skin was red with a hectoid flush.

W. A. Hammond, Nervous System, I. xvi.

hectoliter, hectolitre (hek'tō-lī-tēr), n. [F. hectolitre, < Gr. ἑκατόν (contr.), a hundred, + λίτρον, a pound, > F. litre, see liter.] In the metric system, a unit of capacity equal to 100 liters, 22,009 imperial gallons, or 26.4 United States gallons.

hectometer (hek'tō-mō-tēr), n. [F. hectomètre, < Gr. ἑκατόν (contr.), a hundred, + μέτρον, measure, > F. mètre, E. meter, a particular measure of length: see meter.] In the metric system, a unit of length equal to 100 meters, or 328 feet 1 inch.

hector (hek'tor), n. [L. Hector, < Gr. Ἡέκτωρ, in Homer's Iliad a brave Trojan warrior, prop. adj. Ἡέκτωρ, holding fast, an epithet of Zeus, of anchors, of a net, etc., < ἔχω, hold: see hectic.] 1. A bully; a blustering, turbulent, noisy fellow.

Thus the hectors use to do, and to give the lie at adventure, when they have a mind to try a man's courage.

Marvell, Works, II. 109.

2. One who teases or vexes.

hector (hek'tor), v. [hector, n.] I. trans. 1. To treat with insolence; threaten; bully.

Our King did openly say, the other day in the Privy Chamber, that he would not be hectored out of his right and preeminency by the King of France, as great as he was.

Pepys, Diary, II. 98.

2. To find fault with; fret at; chide; scold.

An honest man, when he came home at night, found another fellow domineering in his family, hectoring his servants, and calling for supper.

Arbutnot, John Bull.

They had hard times when they were little, . . . and were hectored and worried when they ought to have been taking some comfort.

H. B. Stone, Oldtown, p. 245.

=Syn. To fret, worry, annoy, beset, provoke, irritate.

II. intrans. To play the bully; bluster; be turbulent or insolent.

But when huffing and hectoring must be looked upon as the only badges of gallantry and courage, what can recommend the exercise of patience against the disgrace of it?

South, Works, X. iv.

Don Carlos made her chief director,

That she might o'er the servants hector.

Swift.

Hectorian, Hectorean (hek'tō-rī-an, -rē-an), a. [hector (see def.) + -ian, -ean.] Relating or pertaining to or like Hector of Troy.

In vain I charg'd him soon to quit the plain,
And warn'd to shun Hectorean force in vain.

Pope, Iliad, xviii. 18.

hectorism (hek'tor-izm), n. [hector + -ism.] The disposition or practice of a hector or bully.

[Rare.]

hectorly (hek'tor-li), a. [hector + -ly.] Resembling a hector; blustering; insolent.

Those who seek glory from evil things, . . . from presumptuous transgression of God's law (hectorly profaneness and debauchery), . . . are not only vain-glorious, but impudent.

Barron, Works, III. xxxi.

hectostere (hek'tō-stēr), n. [F. hectostère, < Gr. ἑκατόν (contr.), a hundred, + στερεόν, solid, > F. stère, E. stère, as a measure of solidity.] In the metric system, a measure of solidity containing 100 cubic meters, and equivalent to 3,531.4 English cubic feet.

he'd. A contraction of (a) he had, and of (b) he would.

hedage (hed'āj), n. [A var. of hithage*, < hithe + -age.] A toll or custom formerly paid at the hithe or wharf for landing goods, etc., from which an exemption was granted by the king to particular persons and societies. Cowel.

heddle (hed'1), n. [Sc. also hiddle, obs. hedel, E. also heald; appar. of Scand. origin. Cf. leel.] hafald, the perpendicular thrums that hold the weft.] In weaving, a series of leashes, twines, cords, or wires vertically stretched, generally in pairs, between two horizontal bars or laths, looped about both bars, and joined in their middle part to form eyes for the reception of a warp-thread or yarn.

Two heddles are used for plain weaving, their vertically opposite movements separating the warp-threads to form an opening or shed for the passage of the shuttle. In the United States harness is generally used for heddle, and in English works on weaving leaf or set of heddles is frequently employed. Heddle is often loosely used in the singular to denote one of the pairs of leashes or cords.—Mail of the heddle, an eyelet or ring of glass or metal in an eye of a heddle.

heddle (hed'1), v. t.; pret. and pp. heddled, ppr. heddling. [heddle, n.] To draw (warp-threads) systematically through the eyes of a heddle.

heddle-eye (hed'1-i), n. The eye in a pair of leashes or cords of a heddle for receiving a warp-thread.

heddle-hook (hed'1-hük), n. A hook, much resembling a crochet-hook, used in heddling. It is passed through the heddle-eye to engage the end of the warp-thread and draw the thread through the eye.

heddle-yarn (hed'1-yärn), n. Worsted yarn twisted and singed preparatory to its use in making heddles.

hede¹, n. and v. A Middle English form of head.

hede², v. A Middle English form of heed.

hedenbergite (hed'en-bēr-git), n. [After L. Hedenberg, a Swedish chemist.] A lime-iron variety of pyroxene, occurring in crystals and in lamellar masses of a black or blackish-green color at Tunaberg in Sweden, and elsewhere.

Hedeoma (hē-dē-ō'mā), n. [NL. (Persoon, 1805), said to be altered from Hedysmum (which is used for another genus), < Gr. ἥδης, sweet, & σμήλη, smell.] A genus of chiefly low, herbaceous, aromatic plants, belonging to the natural order Labiata, tribe Satureiineae, characterized by its axillary clusters of small bluish flowers, in which the corolla is scarcely exerted from the calyx, and only two of the stamens are perfect. It embraces about a dozen species, exclusively confined to North and South America. The best-known species is H. pulegioides, the American pennyroyal, which has the pleasantly pungent odor and taste of the genus specially developed, and is in great repute as a remedy for colds and as an emmenagogue.

Pennyroyal (Hedeoma pulegioides).
a, flower; b, leaf.

hederi, adv. A Middle English variant of hither.

Hedera (hed'ē-rā), n. [L. (Linnaeus, 1753), also edera, ivy: see under get.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous woody vines, climbing by rootlets, belonging to the natural order Araliaceae and series Hederee. It is characterized by having the styles connate into a cone or short column, the leaves simple or pinnate, the umbels paniculate, and the pedicels continuous with the flowers. The genus thus limited embraces only two species, one of which, H. Helix, the common ivy, now cultivated in all lands, is indigenous to most temperate and subtropical old-world regions of the northern hemisphere, from the Canary Islands to Japan. The other species, H. Australiana, the Queensland ivy, differs chiefly in having pinnate leaves. The West Indian trees that have been placed in this genus by some authors are now referred to Sciapophyllum; while the so-called Hedera of the Hawaiian Islands, called Cheirodendron by Hillebrand, belongs more properly to the genus Panax. Besides the value of a species of this genus as an ornamental vine, it yields hederic acid, which has medicinal properties, and the berries are emetic. A decoction of the leaves dyes hair black. The genus is found in a fossil state from the Middle Cretaceous to the Quaternary of Europe, the arctic regions, and the United States, more than 20 fossil species having been described. H. Helix is common in the Quaternary deposits of Italy and France.

Hederaceæ (hed-ə-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of L. hederaceus, < hedera, ivy: see hederaceus.] A term first used by Linnaeus in 1751 to include the genera Hedera, Vitis, etc.: made by Bartling in 1830, and by Seeman in 1864, equivalent to Araliaceæ.

hederaceous (hed-ə-rā'shi-us), a. [L. hederaceus, of ivy, ivy-green, < hedera, ivy: see hedera.] 1. Pertaining to, resembling, composed of, or producing ivy.—2. Belonging to the ivy family—that is, to the suborder or series Hederæ.

hederal (hed'ə-rəl), a. [L. hedera, ivy, + -al.] Of or pertaining to ivy. Also hederic.

hederate (hed'ə-rāt), v. t. [L. hedera, ivy, + -ate.] To adorn or crown with ivy, as a victor in the Olympian games.

He appeareth there neither laureated nor hederated poet.
Fuller, Worthies, Yorkshire.

Hederæ (hē-dē'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hedera + -æ.] That subdivision of the natural order of plants Araliaceæ to which the genus Hedera, the ivy, belongs: called by Bentham and Hooker (1862) a series, and embracing, besides Hedera, six other genera. The group is distinguished from the rest of the order by having the petals valvate and of the same number as the stamens, and the albumen of the seed wrinkled.

hederic (hē-dēr'ik), a. [L. hedera, ivy, + -ic.] Same as hederal.

hederiferous (hed-ə-rif'ə-rus), a. [L. hedera, ivy, + ferre = E. bear.] Ivy-bearing; producing ivy.

hederine (hed'ə-rin), n. [L. hedera, ivy, + -ine.] An alkaloid found in the seeds of the common ivy. It is intensely bitter, and appears to be closely allied to quinine in febrifugal qualities. U. S. Dispensatory, 1883.

hederose (hed'ə-rōs), a. [L. hederosus, full of ivy, < hedera, ivy.] Full of ivy; pertaining to ivy.

hederward, adv. A Middle English form of hitherward.

hedge (hej'), n. [ME. hedge, hegge, < *AS. hecg, not found except in the once-occurring dat. hegge, written for either hegge* or hege, but the probable source of the mod. form hedge (cf. E. edge, < AS. ecg; E. wedge, < AS. wecg, etc.), the common AS. form being the nearly related hege, > ME. heyge, haye, E. hay, > q. v.; *AS. hecg = MD. hegghe, D. hegge, heg = MLG. hegge = OHG. hegga, hecca, MHG. G. hecke, a hedge; = Icel. hegg = Norw. hegg = Dan. hegg = Sw. hägg, a kind of tree, the bird-cherry (see heckberry, hedgeberry, heggberry, hagberry), appar. so called (like the hawthorn, q. v.) because used in hedges. Cf. Sw. häck, Dan. hæk, a hedge, prob. after G. The *AS. hecg, E. hedge, and AS. hege, E. hay, are both from the more primitive form, AS. haga, E. haw: see haw, hay.] 1. A barrier or fence formed by bushes or small trees growing close together, such as thorn-bushes or beeches, and sometimes by woven twigs or wattling; also, a closely planted row of any kind of shrubbery, as evergreens, whether intended as a fence or not. See hedge-plant. The hedge is the prevalent kind of fence in England, but is comparatively rare in the United States. Hedges, especially roadside hedges, are often used by vagabonds as places of shelter or resort; hence hedge is often used in composition to denote something mean, low, rustic: as, a hedge-priest; a hedge-school.

The [thee] was saide in fitches floure
Thee to keepe of breere and houndes thorne.
For hegges made of it shall not be torne.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 81.

But Sir, we have taken with her such Beggars, such Rogues, such Vagabonds, and such Hedge-birds (since you call 'em so) as you never knew, or heard of, though now the Countries swarm with 'em under every Hedge, as if an innumerable army of 'em were lately disbanded without Pay. Hedge-birds said you? Hedge Lady-birds, Hedge Cavaliers, Hedge Souldiers, Hedge Lawyers, Hedge Fidlers, Hedge Poets, Hedge Players, and a Hedge Priest among 'em. Such we have taken for the Principals.

Brome, Jovial Crew, v.

The cool shade of this sweet honeysuckle hedge.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 203.

I was forced to go to a little hedge place for my dinner.
Swift, Journal to Stella, xxix.

2. A structure made to lead fish into channels across which nets are spread.

They [the salmon] will force themselves through flood-gates, or over weirs, or hedges, or stops in the water.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 123.

Dead hedge. See dead.—To breast up a hedge. See breast.

hedge (hej'), v.; pret. and pp. hedged, prp. hedging. [ME. heden, heggen (= OD. heggen), hedge, inclose; < hedge, n.] I. trans. 1. To inclose or fence with a hedge; separate by a hedge: as, to hedge a field or garden.

There was a certain householder which planted a vineyard and hedged it round about.

Mat. xxi. 33.

2. To obstruct with a hedge or any barrier; stop or restrain by any kind of obstruction.

I will hedge up thy way with thorns.

Hos. ii. 6.

Nay, this shall not hedge us out: we'll hear you sing, certainly.

Shak., T. and C., iii. 1.

3. To surround with something as a barrier or a border; compass about; hem in.

The first cours: brawne, with the borys hed, lying in a felde, hegge about with a scriptur saying on this wyse: "Welcomme you bretheren godly in this hall!"

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 375.

England hedg'd in with the main. Shak., K. John, ii. 1.

We hedge ourselves round with conventional usages.

Channing, Perfect Life, p. 73.

[In the following passages hedge is peculiarly used, apparently by confusion with edge, v., in the sense of 'force or thrust' (intr. 'force or thrust one's self'), as into a place already full:

When I was hasty, thou delay'st me longer;
I prythee, let me hedge one moment more Into thy promise; for thy life preserved. Dryden.

When you are sent on an errand, be sure to hedge in some business of your own.

Swift, Advice to Servants (Directions to the Footman).]

4. In sporting, to protect by betting on both sides. See to hedge a bet, below.

Now do I suspect

I shall lose the race. . . . I'll hedge in My money presently. Shirley, Hyde Park, iv. 3.

To hedge a bet, to bet on both sides—that is, after having bet on one side, to bet also on the other side, thus guarding one's self against great loss, whatever the result may be.

Te [Montano] first reduced betting into an art, and made White's the grand market for wagers. He is at length such an adept in this art that, whatever turn things take, he can never lose. This he has effected by what he has taught the world to call hedging a bet.

N. and Q., 6th ser., XII. 329.

II. intrans. 1. To hide as in a hedge; shift; skulk.

I, I, myself sometimes, leaving the fear of heaven on the left hand, and hiding mine honour in my necessity, am fain to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch.

Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 2.

2. In betting, to protect one's self from loss by cross-bets. See to hedge a bet, above.

Egremont . . . consulted his book; he meditated anxiously. Should he hedge? Disraeli, Sybil, p. 7.

Hence—3. To provide a means of retreat or escape; avoid committing one's self irrevocably to anything.

Prophecy as much as you like, but always hedge. . . . Say what you will, but don't be too presumptuous and dogmatic.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 12.

4. To make or mend hedges.

Thresh and dig and hedg.
MS. Ashmole, 208. (Hallivell.)

hedge-accator (hej'ak-sen'tor), n. Same as hedge-sparrow, 1. See Accentor, 2 (a).

hedge-bedstraw (hej'bed'strā), n. A plant, Galium Mollugo, growing in hedges. See bed-straw and Galium.

hedge-bells (hej'belz), n. 1. The hedge-bindweed, Convolvulus sepium. See cut under Convolvulus. Also called bell-bind.—2. The common bindweed, C. arvensis. [Rare.]

hedgeberry (hej'ber'i), n.; pl. hedgeberries (-iz). Same as hagberry, the bird-cherry; but in this form it seems more generally to mean the larger sweet bird-cherry, Prunus avium, which is merely a variety of the garden-cherry, P. Cerasus.

hedge-bill, hedging-bill (hej'bil, -ing-bil), n. A cutting-hook used in dressing hedges; a bill-hook.

Comes Master Dametas, with a hedging-bill in his hand.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, i.

hedge-binding (hej'bin'ding), n. Something used to bind together the bushes composing a hedge.

He came and basted me with a hedge-binding.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, ii. 7.

hedge-bindweed (hej'bind'wēd), n. A perennial herbaceous vine, Convolvulus sepium, abundant in both Europe and America, growing along hedges and fences, over which it climbs. It was formerly separated from the true bindweed, C. arvensis, and placed in the genus Calystegia, on account of the large leafy bracts that surround the calyx; but this is no longer regarded as a generic distinction. See Convolvulus.

hedge-bird (hej'bērd), n. A bird that seeks food and shelter in hedges. See haysuck.

hedge-born (hej'bōrn), a. Born under a hedge; hence, of low birth; rustic; obscure; mean.

A hedge-born swain

That doth presume to boast of gentle blood.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 1.

hedge-bote (hej'bōt), n. [hedge + bote, ME. form of boot, reparation, etc.: same as hays-bote.] In Eng. law, an allowance of wood to a tenant for repairing hedges.

Haye-bote or hedge-bote is wood for repairing of hays, hedges, or fences.

Blackstone, Com., III. iii.

hedge-carpenter (hej'kär'pen-tēr), n. A hedge.

[Humorous.]

Pervading poverty and forlornness of the region in the best of seasons serve to repel the poets and philosophers who love to feast their eyes and rest their souls with pleasant things; and the shepherds, the hedge-carpenters, the parish-clerks, and the ditchers, usually have it all to themselves.

Harper's Mag., LXXVII., Literary Notes for Aug.

hedge-chafer (hej'chā'fēr), n. A cockchafer.

hedge-chanter (hej'chān'tēr), n. Same as hedge-sparrow, 1.

hedge-chicken (hej'chik'en), n. The white-throat, Sylvia cinerea. C. Swanson.

hedge-creepier, n. A wily, crafty vagabond and thief. Hollyband, Dict., 1593. (Hallivell.)

hedge-fumitory (hej'fū'mi-tō-ri), n. Probably the fumitory, Fumaria officinalis.

hedge-garlic (hej'gär'lik), n. A cruciferous plant, Sisymbrium Alliaria (Alliaria officinalis), having an odor resembling that of garlic. It has large, cordate, radical leaves, grows to the height of 2 feet, and bears an abundance of erect linear pods. It is common throughout Europe, and has been introduced into the United States near Washington, where it is rapidly spreading. Also called garlic-mustard and sauce-alone.

hedgehog (hej'hog), n. [ME. hegghegoge; < hedge + hog.] 1. In zool., an insectivorous animal of the family Erinaceidæ and genus Erinaceus, of which there are several species. The common European hedgehog, Erinaceus europæus, is about 9 inches long; the body is covered above with spines, and the animal can roll itself into a ball bristling in every direction. This it accomplishes by means of a very highly developed and specialized panniculus carnosus, or fleshy layer beneath the skin, which when the body is flexed acts as a sphincter, like the string which puckers the mouth of a bag. See cut under Erinaceus.

And when he wenyth [thinketh] it be an hare, full oft it is an hegge hogge.

Julsiana Berners, Treatyse of Fysshynge, fol. 1.

Thorny hedgehogges, be not seen.

Shak., M. N. D., ii. 3 (song).

2. One of several other animals characterized by numerous spines. (a) A Madagascan insectivorous animal of the family Cetidae and any of the genera Centetes, Ericulus, and Hemicentetes. Otherwise known as tenrec. (b) An Australian monotrematous mammal of the family Echimidæ; a spiny ant-eater, as Zaglossus bruijnii. See ant-eater (a) (5), and cut under Echimidæ. (c) A prickly fish of the genus Diodon, as D. hystrix, the porcupine-fish, more fully called sea-hedgehog. See cut under Diodon. (d) A sea-urchin.

3. In bot., a plant with echinate fruits. The name is used especially (often in the plural) for Medicago Echinos (M. intertexta), a native of Italy and Greece, the seeds of which are armed with short spines. It has also been given to Erinacea pungens (Anthyllis erinacea), a leguminous plant growing in Spain; to Ranunculus acris, a northern species; to Echinaria capitata, a grass of southern Europe; and to Hydnum erinaceus (also called hedgehog-hydnum), a fungus with tough elastic pileus, and very long straight hymenial spines, growing on the trunks of oak- and beech-trees. Also hedgehog-plant.

4. A kind of dredging-machine consisting of a series of spades fixed to the periphery of a cylinder, used for loosening mud, silt, etc., so that it may be carried off by the current.—

5. In Scotch mining, a broken strand or wire of a rope torn out while in motion and drawn up into a bundle. N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 322.—Hedgehog cone-flower. See cone-flower.

hedgehog-cactus (hej'hog-kak'tus), n. A cactus of the genus Echinocactus, of which about 200 species are known and a large number cultivated. They are all natives of Texas, Mexico, and South America. See cut under Echinocactus.

hedgehog-fruit (hej'hog-frōt), n. The fruit of an Australian tree, Echinocarpus Australis, which belongs to the natural order Tiliaceæ, and attains the height of from 80 to 100 feet. The name is also used for the tree.

hedgehog-grass (hej'hog-grās), n. An American grass, Cenchrus tribuloides, the spikelets of which are collected into burs. It grows in sandy soil, and is found from the great lakes to Florida. A more southern species, C. echinatus, is called the cockspur. There are 10 other species of the genus Cenchrus, chiefly tropical, to all of which the name is applicable. It has been given to Echinaria capitata (see hedgehog, 3) and to species of Panicum of the section Echinochloa. See bottle-brush grass, under bottle-brush, and cut under bur-grass. Also called bur-grass.

hedgehog-parsley (hej'hog-pärs'li), n. An umbelliferous plant, Caucalis daucoides, common on the continent of Europe, and also found in England. The carpels are ribbed, and bear four rows of hooked prickles on the back, forming a sort of bur. Also called bur-parsley.

hedgehog-plant (hej'hog-plant), n. Same as hedgehog, 3.

hedgehog-rat (hej'hog-rat), n. [Tr. NL. Echymys.] Any octodont rodent of the subfamily Echymyinae, which includes the spiny rats and others: so called from the prickly pelage. See Echymyinae, and cut under Echymys.

hedgehog-thistle (hej'hog-this'tl), n. The prickly-pear, Opuntia: also a name of other cacti, as of Cereus, Echinocactus, etc.

hedge-hyssop (hej'his'op), n. 1. A plant of the genus Gratiola, especially G. officinalis, common in nearly all of Europe except the British isles. It was called by the early herbalists Gratia Dei, on account of its reputed healing virtues; and the generic name, as well as the name herb-of-grace, is derived from this. It is a bitter purgative and emetic, poisonous in large doses. It is said to have formed the basis for the famous nostrum for gout, the eau medicinale. It has now nearly gone out of use. The genus Gratiola belongs to the natural order Scrophulariaceae, or figwort family, and embraces about 20 species, more than half of which are found in North America. A single specimen of G. officinalis is reported to have been found in Georgia. The Peruvian or Victorian hedge-hyssop is G. Peruviana, a semi-aquatic species, remarkable for being indigenous to both South America and Australia.

2. In England, the common name of the lesser skullcap, Scutellaria minor, a labiate plant not often growing in hedges.

hedge-jug (hej'jug), n. The bottle-tit or long-tailed titmouse, Acredula rosea: named from the site and shape of its nest. [Local, Eng.]

hedge-knife (hej'nif), n. An instrument for trimming hedges.

hedge-laurel (hej'lâ'rel), n. An Australian plant of the genus Pittosporum, especially P. eugenioides, P. rigidum, or P. tenuifolium, of New Zealand, cultivated in the botanic gardens of Melbourne, Brisbane, etc. They are ornamental evergreen shrubs or small trees, with somewhat showy white or yellowish flowers. See Pittosporum.

hedgemaid (hej'mädz), n. The ground-ivy, Nepeta Glechoma. See Nepeta. Also called hay-maiden, haymaids.

hedge-marriage (hej'mar'äj), n. A secret or clandestine marriage; an irregular marriage performed by a hedge-parson or hedge-priest.

hedge-mike (hej'mik), n. Same as hedge-sparrow, 1.

hedge-mushroom (hej'mush'röm), n. An edible mushroom, Agaricus arvensis, common in Europe. Also called horse-mushroom.

hedge-mustard (hej'mus'tärd), n. 1. A plant of the genus Sisymbrium, especially S. officinale, a stiff-branched European herb with sharply incised leaves and small yellow flowers, which was formerly much used in medicine as an expectorant and a diuretic. It is extensively naturalized in America. See Sisymbrium.—2. Less correctly, a plant of the genus Erysimum, particularly E. odoratum, common on the continent of Europe, but not found in England.

hedge-nettle (hej'net'l), n. In Great Britain, a common labiate plant, Stachys sylvatica, growing along hedges; in America, S. palustris or S. aspera, of similar habit; also, one of the more showy species in cultivation, as S. coccinea, the scarlet hedge-nettle. See Stachys.

hedge-note (hej'nöt), n. A writing of no worth or dignity.

They left these hedge-notes for another sort of poem.

hedge-parsley (hej'pärs'li), n. A common European umbelliferous plant, Caucalis Anthriscus (Torilis Anthriscus); also, any species of Caucalis except C. daucoides, which is called bur-parsley and hedgehog-parsley. They are unattractive weeds.

hedge-parson (hej'pär'sn), n. A mean or illiterate parson; one of a class of vagabond clergymen formerly existing in England.

A hedge-parson, or buckle-beggar, as that order of priesthood has been irreverently termed, sate on the Duke's left.

Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, xvii.

hedge-peak (hej'pëk), n. The dogrose, Rosa canina, the strong prickles of which adapt it for hedges. Also hedge-speak.

The bullesse, hedge-peak, hips, and hawes, and sloes, Attend his appetite where e'r he goes.

Taylor, Works (1630).

I judge it is with men as it is with plants: take one that blossoms too soon, 'twill starve a sloe or hedge-peak.

Howard, A Man of Newmarket.

hedgepig (hej'pig), n. A Hedgehog.

1 Witch. Thrice the brinded cat hath mew'd.

2 Witch. Thrice; and once the hedge-pig whin'd.

Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1.

hedge-pink (hej'pink), n. The soapwort, Saponaria officinalis.

hedge-plant (hej'plant), n. A plant used in or suitable for forming hedges.

Several years ago there was much discussion as to the use of white willow as a hedge-plant, but it is better fitted to form a windbreak.

Amer. Cyc., VIII. 604.

hedge-planter (hej'plan'tër), n. A frame for holding young hedge-plants in position while being set out in a furrow to form a hedge.

hedge-press (hej'pres), n. A printing-press at which literature of a low kind was printed.

A person who, by his style and literature, seems to have been the corrector of a hedge-press in Little Britain, proceeded gradually to an author.

Swift.

hedge-priest (hej'prëst), n. A hedge-parson; specifically, in Ireland, formerly, a priest who had been admitted to orders directly from a hedge-school, without preparation in theological studies at a regular college.

Therefore did some of them at Cambrige (whom I will not name openly) cause hedge-priests sette out of the contrie to be made fellows in the vniuersitie.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 136.

There is five in the first show. . . .

The pedant, the braggart, the hedge-priest, the fool, and the boy.

hedge (hej'ër), n. [hedge + -er.] 1. One who makes or repairs hedges.

What time the labour'd ox

In his loose traces from the furrow came,

And the swink'd hedge at his supper sat.

Milton, Comus, l. 293.

2. In sporting, one who hedges.

hedge-rime (hej'rim), n. Vulgar doggerel.

hedge-row (hej'rö), n. A row or series of shrubs or trees planted for inclosure, or for the separation of fields.

Some time walking, not unseen,

By hedge-row elms, on hillocks green.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 58.

The fields . . . are divided by hedge-rows of myrtle.

Ep. Berkeley, To Pope.

hedge-school (hej'sköl), n. A school formerly kept beside a hedge, or in the open air, in Ireland; a poor, mean school.

You talk with contempt of a hedge-school. Did you never hear of a nate little spot in Greece called the Groves of Academus?

Carleton, Traits and Stories (The Hedge-School).

hedge-schoolmaster (hej'sköl'mäs-tër), n. The master of a hedge-school.

Hedge-schoolmasters were as superior in literary knowledge and acquirements to the class of men who are now engaged in the education of the people as they were beneath them in moral and religious character.

Carleton, Traits and Stories (The Hedge-School).

hedge-scissors (hej'siz'örz), n. pl. A large crooked kind of scissors or shears for trimming hedges.

hedge-shrew (hej'shrö), n. The field-mouse.

The fire-fly and hedge-shrew and lob-worm, I pray,

How fare they?

Browning, Pippa Passes, Epil.

hedge-sparrow (hej'spar'ö), n. 1. A small European warbler, Accentor modularis, resembling a sparrow in coloration and frequenting hedges. Also called hedge-accentor, hedge-chanter, hedge-chat, hedge-mike, hedge-spick, hedge-spurgie, and hedge-warbler. See Accentor, 2 (a).

The hedge-sparrow fed the cuckoo so long

That it had its head bit off by its young.

Shak., Lear, l. 4.

2†. An old book-name of the Jamaican guinigt or rufous-throated tanager, Glossptila ruficollis. G. Edwards.—3. Some other hedge-bird, supposed to be a sparrow.

hedge-spick (hej'spik), n. Same as hedge-sparrow, 1.

hedge-spurgie (hej'spër'ji), n. Same as hedge-sparrow, 1. [Scotch.]

hedge-taper (hej'tä'për), n. Same as hag-taper. See mullen.

hedge-thorn (hej'thörn), n. See hawthorn.

hedge-vine (hej'vin), n. The virgin's-bower of Europe, Clematis Vitalba.

hedge-violet (hej'vi'ö-let), n. The common European wood-violet, Viola sylvatica.

hedge-warbler (hej'wär'blër), n. Same as hedge-sparrow, 1.

hedge-writer (hej'ri'tër), n. A Grub-street writer or low author.

These hedge-writers . . . seldom speak a word against any of the late ministry, but they presently fall to compliment my lord treasurer and others in great places.

Swift, Remarks on Letter to the Seven Lords.

hedging (hej'ing), n. [Verbal n. of hedge, v.] The process or work of making or trimming hedges.

He [the agricultural laborer] will . . . proceed to his work direct, to the stables, or to the business of hedging and ditching.

Escott, England, xl.

hedging-bill, n. See hedge-bill.

hedging-glove (hej'ing-glöv), n. A strong leather glove worn to protect the hand in trimming hedges.

hedonic (hë-dön'ik), a. [Gr. ἡδονικός, of or for pleasure, ἡδονή, Dor. ἀόδω, delight, ἡδονα, intr., delight, enjoy oneself, connected with ἀνδάνω, tr., please, delight, gratify, also with ἡδύς = Skt. svādū = L. suavis = E. sweet, q. v.] 1. Pertaining to or consisting in pleasure.

The changes above mentioned in the hedonic effects of bitter tastes, sweet tastes, or the like, tend rather to prove the contrary.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., xX. 68.

2. Of the nature of hedonism; regarding one's own enjoyment as the chief good.

hedonical (hë-dön'ik-äl), a. [hedonic + -al.] Same as hedonic.

Hedonics (hë-dön'iks), n. [Pl. of hedonic: see -ics.] That branch of ethics which treats of the doctrine of pleasure; the science of active or positive pleasure or enjoyment.

hedonism (hë-dön'izm), n. [Gr. ἡδονή, delight, enjoyment, pleasure (see hedonic), + -ism.] The doctrine of Aristippus and the Cyrenaic school of Greek philosophers, that the pleasure of the moment is the only possible end, that one kind of pleasure is not to be preferred to another, and that a man should in the interest of pleasure govern his pleasures and not be governed by them; hence, that ethical doctrine which regards pleasure or happiness as the highest good. The term hedonism is regarded by some writers as defamatory, but others apply it to their own opinions. Egoistic hedonism considers only the pleasure of the individual; altruistic hedonism takes into account that of others.

The fundamental assumption of Hedonism, clearly stated, is that all feelings considered merely as feelings can be arranged in a certain scale of desirability, so that the desirability or pleasantness of each bears a definite ratio to that of all the others.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics (2d ed.), p. 115.

Hedonism I understand to abstract pleasure and pain from life, and to make of everything else a mere external means to the getting of one and the avoiding of the other. Hedonism holds, in short, that every other aspect of the world is absolutely worthless.

F. H. Bradley, Mind, XIII. 36.

hedonist (hë-dön'nist), n. [As hedon-ism + -ist.]

1. One of the Cyrenaic school of ancient Greek philosophers.—2. One who advocates or acts upon the theory of hedonism; one who regards pleasure as the chief good.

The Hedonist, understanding by the bettering of men an addition to the pleasures enjoyed by them, present and to come, has at any rate an obscure computation before him.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 378.

hedonistic (hë-dön'nis'tik), a. [hedonist + -ic.] Pertaining to hedonists or the doctrine of hedonism; of the nature of hedonism.

How vague and empty then the vague discussions concerning the hedonistic or altruistic primum mobile of individual conduct.

Maudsley, Mind and Will, li. 167.

Any hedonistic theory might be met by the assertion that life is essentially a painful experience, and pleasure unattainable.

W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 258.

Hedriophthalma, hedriophthalmous (hed'ri-ö-thäl'mä, -mus), n. Same as Edriophthalma, edriophthalmous.

Hedwigia (hed-wij'i-ä), n. [NL. (Ehrhart, 1781), named after Johann Hedwig.] A genus of saxicolous mosses, characterized by a sessile, globular, smooth capsule with an obtuse operculum, without a peristome, and with a conical lacinate calyptra, the leaves without a costa and hyaline at the summit.

Hedwigiaceæ (hed-wij-i-ä'së-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Hedwigia + -aceæ.] A family of mosses established by Bruch, Schimper, and Gumbel in 1845, embracing the genera Hedwigia, Hedwigidium, and Braunia.

Hedwigieæ (hed-wij-i-ä'së-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Hedwigia + -eæ.] A division of mosses made by Angström in 1846, embracing the genus Hedwigia only.

Hedycarya (hed-i-kar'i-ä), n. [NL. (Forster, 1775), < Gr. ἡδύς, sweet, + κάρυον, nut.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Monimiaceae, characterized by the 7 to 10 small connivent lobes of the perianth and the numerous stamens with very short glandless filaments. The genus embraces about 8 species, inhabiting Australia, New Zealand, New Caledonia, and the Fiji Islands. They are trees or shrubs with opposite entire or dentate coriaceous leaves, and axillary flowers in cymes or racemose panicles. The Australian species, H. angustifolia, is cultivated for ornament, under the name of native mulberry or smooth holly. It attains a height of 10 to 20 feet. The New Zealand species, H. dentata, is larger, and is called by the natives puripuri, kupiri, kauhiria, or porokauhiria. Five fossil species have been described from the Miocene of Italy and Bohemia, the Oligocene of Styria, and the Eocene of Australia and New Zealand.

Hedychium (hē-dik'i-um), n. [NL. (Koenig, 1785), prob. in allusion to the snow-white fragrant flowers of some species, being appar. < Gr. hōs, sweet, + χιών, snow.] A genus of monocotyledonous petaloid plants, belonging to the natural order Scitamineae (Zingiberaceae), tribe Zingibereae, characterized by a terminal spike or thyrs of flowers with narrow elongated filaments and unappendaged connectives to the anthers. The plants grow from a horizontal tuberous rhizome; the stem is erect and leafy, the leaves clasping at the base. The flowers are generally large, showy, and fragrant. The fruit is a 3-celled capsule. The genus embraces about 25 species, all natives of tropical Asia. Many of the species are cultivated in greenhouses, sometimes under the English name garland-flower. The common garland-flower is H. coronarium. H. coccineum (the scarlet garland-flower), H. flavescens, H. coriaceum, etc., embracing a great variety in color and appearance, are also cultivated.

Hedyle (hed'i-lē), n. [NL. (Guenée, 1857), < Gr. hōlōs, dim. of hōs, sweet.] The only genus of Hedylinae, with one species, H. heliconiaria, of Guiana, specifically named from its resemblance to butterflies of the genus Heliconia.

Hedylinae (hed-i-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL. (Guenée, 1857), < Hedyle + -inae.] A subfamily of Geometridae, founded on the genus Hedyle. Also Hedylidae, with family rank.

Hedyotae (hed-i-ot'ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hedyotis + -ae.] A subtribe of plants, of the natural order Rubiaceae, established by A. P. de Candolle in 1830, having the genus Hedyotis as the type. See Hedyotideae.

Hedyotideae (hed-i-ot'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hedyotis + -idae.] Lindley's name (1845) for the Hedyotideae.

Hedyotideae (hed'i-ō-tid'ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hedyotis + -idae.] A group of genera of rubiaceous plants, erected by Humboldt, Bonpland, and Kunth, about the year 1815, having Hedyotis as the type. It was adopted by Bentham and Hooker as the sixth tribe of the order, and by them limited to genera having valvate corolla-lobes, a 2- to 4-celled ovary, the ovules numerous in the cells, and a dry capsular or indehiscent fruit with small or minute seeds. They are chiefly herbs with opposite stipulate leaves.

Hedyotis (hed-i-ō'tis), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), so called from the smooth, tough, oval leaves, likened to ears, < Gr. hōs, sweet, + ōis (ōr-) = E. ear.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Rubiaceae, tribe Hedyotideae, to which it gives its name: scarcely distinguishable botanically from Houstonia and Oldenlandia, but chiefly old-world shrubs or suffrutescent plants. There are about 30 species, chiefly natives of tropical Asia, with mostly narrow opposite leaves, persistent, often dissected setose stipules connate with the petioles in a sheath, and small white flowers in terminal or axillary cymes. Some botanists regard this genus as a section of Oldenlandia.

hedypbane (hed'i-fān), n. [So called in allusion to its glittering, < Gr. hōdypbanēs (equiv. to hōdypbanēs), sweetly shining, < hōs, sweet, + φαίνεσθαι, shine, appear.] A mineral related to mimetite or lead arseniate, but having part of the lead replaced by calcium.

Hedysareae (hed-i-sā'rē), n. pl. [NL., < Hedysarum + -ae.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Leguminosae, suborder Papilionaceae, established by A. P. de Candolle in 1825, and adopted by Bentham and Hooker: type Hedysarum. The plants are chiefly herbs or shrubs with odd-pinnate leaves, the flowers with 10 stamens, either diadelphous (9 + 1) or monadelphous, uniform versatile anthers, and indehiscent jointed pods, the divisions 1-seeded.

Hedysarum (hē-dis'ā-rum), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753, orig. in Tournefort, 1717), < Gr. hōdysarōn, a plant of the vetch kind, perhaps sainfoin, appar. < hōs, = E. sweet, + ἀσάρον, a broom, a besom. Sometimes erroneously explained as < hōs + ἀρώμα, smell: see aroma.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Leguminosae and suborder Papilionaceae, and type of the tribe Hedysareae, having many-jointed pods, the segments separating at maturity, and the vexillary stamens free. It embraces about 60 species, natives of the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere. They are perennial herbs or suffrutescent plants, rarely true shrubs, with odd-pinnate leaves, scarious stipules, and purple, white, or rarely yellow flowers in peduncled axillary racemes. The best-known species is H. coronarium, a native of southern Europe, and known in England as French honeysuckle, probably from its resemblance to the red clover, Trifolium pratense, which is often called honeysuckle or honeysuckle-clover in England. It is in repute as a forage-plant, and has been introduced into Australia under the name of soula-clover. H. boreale is indigenous in the north-eastern United States and northward.

heel¹ (hē), pron. An obsolete spelling of heel.

hee² (hē), a. An obsolete or dialectal variant of high.

heed¹ (hēd), v. [ME. heden (pret. hedde), < AS. hēdan (pret. hēdde), heed, take care of, take charge of, take into possession (= OS. hōdian, hwođian = OFries. hōda, hūda = D. hoeden, heer, guard, = MLG. hoden, huden = OHG. huoten, MHG. hūeten, G. hüten, guard, protect), < hōd*, f. of hōdan (= OFries. hōda, hūda, care, = D. hoede, f. = MLG. hode, hude, hote = OHG. huota, MHG. huote, huot, G. hut, f., heed, care); prob. connected with hōd, m., E. hood (= D. hoed = G. hut, a hat, hood), and perhaps with hāt, E. hat; the orig. sense being appar. 'cover, protect': see hood and hat.] For the vowel-change, cf. bleed, breed, feed, gleed.] I. trans. To give attention to; regard with care; take notice of; observe; consider.

heehaw (hē'hā), v. i. [Imitative of the bray of the ass. Cf. haw-haw, ha-ha.] To bray, as an ass.

Suppose thou art making an ass of thyself, young Harry Warrington, of Virginia! are there not people in England who heehaw too?
Thackeray, Virginians.

A jackass heehaws from the rick. Tennyson, Amphion.

heel¹ (hēl), n. [ME. heel, heele, < AS. hēla, hēla (= OFries. hēla, heila, North Fries. hael, hāile, hājel, hāgel = OD. hie, D. hiel = Icel. hēll = Sw. hāl = Dan. hæl), the heel, prob. orig. hō-hāla*, dim. of hōh, the heel, the hock, > E. *hock*¹, hough. Cf. D. hak = LG. hakke, > G. hacke (vulg.), the heel: see *hock*¹, *hack*¹, n. The generally asserted connection with L. calc (calc-), the heel (see *calc*¹, *calc*¹, etc.), = Gr. λάξ (for λάξ*?), is open to question.] 1. The part of the foot which is below and behind the ankle. Technically—(a) In anat., the calcaneal part of the tarsus, whatever its shape or position. In man and other plantigrade animals it rests on the ground; in digitigrades, ungulates, etc., it is elevated, and is often called knee by a misnomer, heel being popularly applied to the hoofs of the hind legs. Thus, the hock of a horse is anatomically the heel. See cuts under foot, *hock*¹, and lion.
Well-apparell'd April on the heel
Of limping winter treads. Shak., R. and J., i. 2.

(b) In ornith.: (1) Properly, the calcaneum or talus, at the proximal end of the tarsometatarsus. (2) The hind toe or hallux of a bird: incorrect, but frequent. (c) In entom.: (1) The terminal extremity of the tibia. Say (and others). (2) The base of the first tarsal joint, when it is curved to join the tibia. This is the calx of Kirby, by him limited to the heels of four posterior tarsi. (3) A name given by Leach to the bristles forming the strigilia.
2. A part of a thing resembling the heel in shape or position. (a) The lower backmost part of something, or that part upon which it rests, as the after end of a ship's keel, the lower part of a mast, a boom, a stern-post, or a rafter, or the larger or principal end of a tool: used in a great variety of special applications.
At the other side is a kind of heel or knob, to break cloths with.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

(b) In odontol., a low posterior cusp of the sectorial molar tooth of a carnivorous animal. (c) In arch., a cyma reversa. (d) The top of the butt of a gun-stock. (e) That part of the blade of a sword which is nearest the hilt, usually the heaviest part of the blade, and in some swords not sharpened, but having two square edges. (f) The latter or concluding part of anything; the end; a part left over; a remainder: as, the heel of a session or a discourse; the heel of a loaf.

Oh wives, be mindfu' once yoursell'
How bonnie lads ye wanted,
An' dinna, for a keebuck-heel,
Let lassies be affronted. Burns, Holy Fair.

(g) The part of the head of a golf-club that is nearest the shaft.

3. The foot, without reference to its parts; also, the hind foot of some animals, as of a horse.
Mine own familiar friend . . . hath lifted up his heel against me.
Ps. xli. 9.

So light were my heels, that I counted ten miles no better than a leap. Kemp (Arber's Eng. Garner, VII. 27).

Laughing-stocks of Time,
Whose brains are in their hands and in their heels.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

4. The hinder and lower part of a shoe or stocking. In a stocking it includes the lower as well as the back part; in a shoe it is properly restricted to the lower or bottom part, usually formed of a series of pieces of leather called lifts or taps, the part which covers the hind part of the foot being called the quarters. See quarter and heel-tap, and out under boot.

His wife rustled by his side in brocade which might almost stand alone for stiffness, propped upon heels that gave a majestic altitude to her tall, thin figure.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 50.

5. pl. Footsteps; course.

Where death and danger dog the heels of worth.

Shak., All's Well, iii. 4.

Let us address to tend on Hector's heels.

Shak., T. and C., iv. 4.

At one's heels, close behind; following closely.

More true joy Marcellus exiled feels

Than Caesar with a senate at his heels.

Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 258.

At the hard heels!, very close behind. Nares.

Sirrah! Robin! we were best look that your devil can answer the stealing of this same cup, for the vintner's boy follows us at the hard heels.

Marlowe, Faustus.

Down at heel or heels, having the heels or back part of the shoes turned down; in a slipshod condition; hence, in a slovenly or embarrassed condition of any kind; used adjectively, slipshod; slovenly; seedy.

Sneak into a corner, . . . down at heels and out at elbows.

Gentleman Instructed, p. 212.

To prawl about . . . in the old slipshod, purposeless, down-at-heel way.

Dickens.

Fray'd i' the knees, and out at elbow, and bald o' the back, and bursten at the toes, and down at heels.

Tennyson, Queen Mary, i. 1.

Heel of the hand, the prominence formed on the palmar side of the junction of the hand with the wrist, when the hand is strongly bent backward; that part of the hand which corresponds to the heel as the palm corresponds to the sole.

The heel of the operator's hand will be used for vigorous friction of the palm.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 645.

Heels o'er gowdy, heels over head. [Scotch.]

Soon heels o'er gowdy! in he gangs.

Burns, On Life.

Heels over head, somersault fashion; hence, recklessly; hastily.

Ay hele over hed, hourlande aboute.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 271.

Neck and heels. Same as neck and crop (which see, under crop).—Out at heels, having the stockings or shoes worn out at the heels; hence, in embarrassed circumstances: equivalent to the phrases down at heels and out at elbows.

A good man's fortune may grow out at heels.

Shak., Lear, ii. 2.

To come to heel, to follow closely at the heel; to heel, as a dog.

It will be well to teach the dog to come to heel, and to keep there.

Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 225.

Unless properly trained to come to heel, a dog is worse than useless.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 166.

To cool the heels. See cool.—To have the heels of, to outrun.—To kick one's heels, to stand idly waiting.

I suppose this is a spice of foreign breeding, to let your uncle kick his heels in your hall.

Poots, The Minor, ii.

To lay by the heels, to fetter; shackle; confine.

If the king blame me for 't, I'll lay ye all

By the heels.

Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 3.

To pick up one's heels. (a) To lift the feet in running; run. [Colloq.] (b) To take to flight; start off; as, he picked up his heels and ran like a deer. [Colloq.]—To show the heels, show a clean pair of heels, to flee; run away.

Crack—crack, from a couple of barrels, and they showed me their heels, as you may believe.

The Century, XXXVI. 127.

To take to one's heels, to flee; take to flight.

But as we drew nearer unto him, he discerned we were not those he looked for, he took to his heels, and fled from his houses.

Sir Francis Drake Revived, p. 27.

heel¹ (hēl'), v. [<heel¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To perform by the use of the heels or feet, as a dance. [Rare.]

I cannot sing,

Nor heel the high lavoit, nor sweeten talk.

Shak., T. and C., iv. 4.

2. To furnish with a heel or heel-piece, as any foot-covering; put a heel to, as a shoe or stocking.

To cobble, and heel hose for the poor friars.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, v. 3.

3. To catch by the heels.

I have seen them [cowboys] rope a calf too large to handle with one rope; one would heel him (rope him by the hind feet), while the other roped him about the neck.

New York Evening Post, Jan. 14, 1887.

4. To arm with a gaff or spur; as a cock.—5. To equip or arm. See heeled, 2. [Slang, western U. S.]

II. intrans. In sporting, to come or walk behind one's heels: used of a dog, and chiefly in command.

See that he [the collie] possesses a good nose, is staunch on point and charge, heels properly.

Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 448.

heel² (hēl'), v. [Also written (dial.) heal, hele, hill; a corruption, due appar. to confusion of the orig. pres. with the pret., of the earlier heald, heald¹, which remains in dial. use; see heald, heald¹.] I. trans. 1. To tilt, incline, or cant over from a vertical position, as a ship.

I find it is true that the Dutch did heele "The Charles" to get her down, and yet run aground twice or thrice.

Pepys, Diary, III. 179.

2. To pour out. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. To turn partly over; come to a tilted position; cant: as, the ship heeled over.

Eight hundred of the brave, heeler (hē'lēr'), n. [<heel¹ + -er¹.] 1. A cock that strikes well with his heels.—2. A quick runner. [Prov. Eng. and New Eng.]—3. [Cf. LG. hakken-liker (lit. 'heel-watcher': see keek) and hakken-treder (lit. 'heel-treader': see tread), a lackey (who follows at the heels of his master).] One who follows at the heels of another; an unscrupulous or disreputable follower or hanger-on of a professional politician or "boss," or of a party. [Political slang, U. S.]

To have fine clothes, drink champagne, and pose in a fashionable bar-room in the height of the season—is not this the apotheosis of the heeler and the ward "worker"?

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 268.

What the client was to his patron at Rome, what the vassal was to his lord in the Middle Ages, that the heelers and workers are to their boss in these great transatlantic cities. They render a personal feudal service, which their suzerain repays with the gift of a livelihood.

Bryce, American Commonwealth, lxiii.

heeling (hē'ling'), n. Same as heel².

heeling-error (hē'ling-er'ōr'), n. A deviation of the compass-needle on board ship from the magnetic pole, caused by induced magnetism in the transverse iron beams of the ship. This induction is due to the inclination of the beams in the direction of the magnetic pole when the ship heels, or inclines to one side or the other.

heel-iron (hēl'ī'ern'), n. A metal plate sometimes attached to the bottom of the heel of a boot to prevent it from wearing unevenly, or with which to make a clattering noise in clog-dancing. Also heel-plate.

heel-jigger (hēl'jig'ēr'), n. A small tackle fastened to the heel of a spar to assist in running it in and out.

heel-joint (hēl'joint'), n. In ornith., the supra-gro; the ankle-joint; the so-called tibiotarsal articulation of a bird, between the leg or crus and the tarsometatarsus or shank. See tarsus.

heel-knee (hēl'nē'), n. Naut., the knee connecting the keel with the stern-post.

heel-lift (hēl'lift'), n. One of the pieces of sole-leather of which the heel of a shoe is formed.

heel-machine (hēl'ma-shēn'), n. A general name for a number of tools and machines employed in cutting out the lifts of which the heels of shoes are made, putting them together, and shaping, fitting, and polishing them.

heel-pad (hēl'pad'), n. In ornith., the pterna; the posterior part of the palma, immediately under the foot-joint, and prominent in many birds.

But heel-pad should not be used in this connection, since the heel (calcaneus) is at the top of the tarsus, and not at the bottom where the heel-pad lies.

Coues, Hist. N. A. Birds, III. Gloss., p. 545.

heel-path (hēl'pāth'), n. [Opposite the tow-path, as if this were the toe-path.] The side of a canal opposite the tow-path. [Local, U. S.]

heel-piece (hēl'pēs'), n. 1. That part of a shoe or stocking which incloses the heel of the foot either beneath or behind, or both; the heel.

And then it grieved me sore to look

Just at the heel-piece of his boot.

Hegelian (hē-gē'li-an), a. and n. [Hegel (see Hegelianism) + -ian.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Hegel or his system of philosophy; propounded by Hegel: as, the Hegelian theory of universal history. See Hegelianism.

The Hegelian Logic is at once a Logic and a Metaphysics—i. e., it treats at once of the method and of the matter of knowledge, of the processes by which truth is discovered, and of the truth itself in its most universal aspects. E. Caird, Hegel, p. 186.

II. n. One who accepts the philosophical opinions of Hegel; a follower of Hegel.

Hegelianise, v. t. See Hegelianize.

Hegelianism (hē-gē'li-an-izm), n. [Hegelian + -ism.] The philosophical system of Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831), which during the second quarter of the nineteenth century was the leading system of metaphysical thought in Germany. It purports to be a complete philosophy, undertaking to explain the whole universe of thought and being in its abstracted elements and minutest details. This it does by means of the Hegelian dialectic, a new logic, the real law of the movement of thought (not a mere form, like syllogistic), the scheme of which is thesis, antithesis, synthesis, the original tendency, the opposing tendency, and their unification in a new movement. By this law the conceptions of logic develop themselves in a long series. This law of the development of thought is assumed to be necessarily the law of the development of being, on the ground that thought and being are absolutely identical. Hegelianism is radically hostile to natural science, and especially to the Newtonian philosophy—that is, to all the methods and scientific results which have sprung from the "Principia." One of the characteristics of Hegelianism is its constant readiness to recognize continuity both as a fact and as acceptable to reason, which other metaphysical systems have often struggled to deny. Also Hegelmism.

Hegelianize (hē-gē'li-an-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Hegelianized, ppr. Hegelianizing. [Hegelian + -ize.] To render Hegelian. Also spelled Hegelianise.

The Hegelianizing of Kant may be best illustrated from the section on the "Deduction of the Categories." Mind, XII, 94.

Hegelism (hē'gel-izm), n. Same as Hegelianism. hegemonic (hē-jē-mon'ik), a. [Gr. ἡγεμονικός, < ἡγεμῶνα, leadership, see hegemony.] Ruling; predominant; principal.

heifer (hef'ēr), n. [Early mod. E. also haifer, and with orig. guttural heighfer, heckfer, heckfere, heckfar, heckfare, heckfor, heckford, heeforde, etc., corruptly haugher (Caxton); E. dial. also transposed heifker; < ME. hayfare, hekefere, hekefere, < AS. heahfore, also heahfru (gen. heahfore, acc. heahfore), ONorth. pl. hēhfar, a heifer; an isolated word, appar. a compound, < heah, high, + -fore, -fare, a supposed fem. form (equiv. to D. vaars, also in comp. vaarkoe (D. koe = E. cow)) = MLG. verse = MHG. verse, G. färs, a heifer, < fearr, ONorth. far = MD. varre, D. var = OHG. furro, far, MHG. varre, var, G. farre = Icel. farri, a bullock (Teut. stem fars*); prob. allied to Gr. ῥόπις, ῥόπρις, a heifer: see *farrow*², a. The prefix heigh, 'high,' is taken to mean 'full-grown' (Skeat), but a heifer is not full-grown. The AS. form is generally glossed by L. altile, or ML. altitium, a fattened calf (also applied to other fattened animals), < L. altilis, a., fattened, < alere, nourish, feed, suggesting that AS. heah in heahfore is an awkward translation, meaning 'high-fed,' of L. altilis, or simply of the related L. altus, high, lit. 'grown,' < alere, nourish, feed: see alt, altitude, etc., and old. But this is uncertain. The peculiar ME. forms would seem to favor a connection with D. hokkeling, G. hokling, a yearling calf, appar. < D. hok, a stall, pen, + dim. -ling; but the change of AS. heah to heck is supported by hock, in hockday, from the same AS. heah.] 1. A young cow.

Israel, whom God calleth Jeshurun, and compareth to an heifer fed in large and fruitful pastures, going always at full bit, grew fat and wanton. Bp. Sanderson, Works, III, 194.

Swift, Sentiments of a Ch. of Eng. Man, ii.

The Church and the monarchy were the two national powers which had been raised to a height above all others through the strife with heathendom and the Danes.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 304.

3. The highest part; the top; hence, culmination; the highest degree; the highest point to be attained or desired: as, the height of a fever; the height of fashion.

All my former wrongs
Were but beginnings to my miseries,
But this the height of all.

Pletcher, Spanish Curate, iii. 3.

James was now at the height of power and prosperity.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

4. That which has highness; an elevation; an eminence, especially of land; a hill, mountain, or precipice: often in the plural: as, to ascend a height; the Heights of Abraham at Quebec.

From Alpine heights the father first descends;
His daughter's husband in the plain attends.

Dryden, Æneid.

5†. Latitude; degree of distance from the equator, whether north or south.

The heritage that the air sholde haue ys at the kynges wille.
Piers Plowman (C), xl. 240.

The nation looked kindly on the one sound administrator, and the more so perhaps when they saw in him the rightful heir to the throne.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 347.

(a) Technically, in law, the person upon whom the law casts an estate in real property immediately on the death of the ancestor, as distinguished from one who takes by will as a legatee or devisee, and from one who succeeds by law to personal property as next of kin. The same person who is heir when considered with reference to realty is often also next of kin when considered with reference to personality; and where a testator's will disposes of part only of his realty, the same person who takes under the will as devisee may also take an undisposed-of part as heir. In this sense the word as used at common law does not include a widow on whom the law casts an estate in dower, or a husband on whom the law casts an estate by the courtesy, for these are considered new estates, arising out of marriage and its incidents, and carved out of the fee, not as a continuation or devolution of the fee itself. If there be dower or courtesy, the heir is that person who takes immediate title to the fee, subject to such life-estate. In legal phrase heir and heir at law are commonly used in England in the singular, because the general rule of descent there has given the entire estate to the eldest male. The singular is also not uncommonly used in the United States to designate whoever may be entitled, whether one or more, because of English usage, and because appropriate in all cases where there is but one standing in the nearest degree to the deceased.

General heirs may be in either the ascending or descending line: for example, a father or grandfather might be a general heir to the last owner, as well as a son or a grandson. "Collateral heirs" are those deriving their descent through some stock in the ascending line: for instance, a brother as a son of the common father, or an uncle as the son of the common grandfather, or a sister, or an aunt, or a cousin. "Heirs in tail" can only be in the descending line. L. A. Goodeve, Modern Law of Real Property, p. 61.

It is a settled principle of law that the legal rights of the heir or distributee to the property of deceased persons cannot be defeated except by a valid devise of such property to other persons.

Chief Justice Ruger, 105 New York Reports, 193.

(b) In a broader sense, in those jurisdictions where the distinction between realty and personality is disregarded, the person entitled by law to succeed one dying in respect of either kind of property, as distinguished from those taking by will. In jurisdictions where the distinction is preserved, a testamentary gift of personality, expressed to be to one's heirs, is commonly understood to intend his next of kin. (c) In another extended sense, one in a series of heirs; any successive inheritor, including not only him who takes immediately upon the death of the ancestor, but also those who have inherited through several successive descents. (d) In the most general sense, the person upon whom property of any kind devolves on the death of another, either by law or by will. Thus, the children of a person deceased are popularly spoken of as his heirs, irrespective of the nature of the property or the mode in which it passed. In much this sense heirs was used in the Roman law.

2. One who inherits anything; one who receives any endowment by inheritance or transmission.

I had not now been heir to heaven's just scorn
If in Earth's eye my shape had been forlorn.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 143.

3. A child regarded with reference to anything due to his parentage; an offspring in general.

If the first heir of my invention prove deformed I shall be sorry it had so noble a godfather.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, Ded.

And his heirs, a phrase in a grant to a person named, usually denoting, under technical common-law rules, that an estate of inheritance capable of passing to him is conveyed, as distinguished from a life-estate in him only, and as distinguished from a life-estate in him with a remainder to those persons who may on his death prove to be his heirs.—Behavior as heir. See behavior.—Expectant heir, one having expectations founded on the probability or possibility of coming into a future property, whether as heir or next of kin or as devisee or legatee, and who by reason of present need or desire of ready means is prone to be tempted to sell his expectancy. The improvident assignments and mortgages which result, called in the law catching bargains, are often set aside or modified in the English Court of Chancery.—Forced heir. See forced, v. t.—Heir apparent (used of a person whose ancestor is still living), an heir whose right is indefeasible, provided he survives the ancestor, as distinguished from an heir presumptive, whose expectation may be defeated by the birth of a nearer relative, as a brother of a man who has as yet no children. According to the law of Scotland, an heir apparent is the person to whom the succession has actually opened, and who remains apparent heir until his regular entry, in law constat.—Heir at law, an heir in sense 1 (a).—Heir by custom, one whose right as heir is determined by certain customary modes of descent which are attached to the land, such as gavelkind or borough-English.—Heir by limitation, a phrase sometimes used to designate a devisee or donee who takes not by succession as heir of the testator or grantor, but because he answers to the description of "heir of" a specified person used in the will or deed. Thus, if a testator gives property to his wife for life and at her death to the heir of A, child of A who should be used to do so not as heir by way of inheritance from either, but as heir by limitation. The distinction is important in several ways, as, for instance, if A died insolvent, land which his child took as his heir by inheritance would be liable for his debts, but land which he took as heir by limitation, under a gift from the supposed testator, would not.—Heir general, an heir in sense 1 (a), as distinguished from an heir special, one to whom the estate passes by virtue of an entail. See tail.

Heir presumptive. See heir apparent.

Warwick . . . did not scruple to show his displeasure, and began a counter-intrigue for the marriage of one of his daughters with the duke of Clarence, the heir presumptive to the throne. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 358.

Heir special. See heir general.

heir (ār), v. t. [< heir, n.] To inherit; succeed to.

My younger brother will heir my land;
Fair England again I'll never see.
Young Beichan and Susie Pye (Child's Ballads, IV. 3).

When falls a mate in battle broil,
His comrade heirs his portioned spoil.
Scott, Rokeby, i. 21.

heir-apparency (ār-a-pār'ən-si), n. The state of being heir apparent.

heirdom (ār'dum), n. [< heir + -dom.] The state of being an heir; succession by inheritance. Burke.

heirress (ār'es), n. [< heir + -ess.] A female heir; especially, a woman inheriting or who is expected to inherit considerable wealth.

His only child, his Edith, whom he loved
As heirress and not heir regretfully.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

heir-land (ār'land), n. Land passing by descent. Pollock.

heirless (ār'les), a. [< heir + -less.] Destitute of an heir.

The monster, dead and heirless, who shall have His crown and capital?
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 174.

heirloom (ār'löm), n. [< heir + loom¹, in its orig. sense of 'tool, implement,' extended to mean 'article.'] 1. In Eng. law, a personal chattel that, contrary to the nature of chattels, by special custom descends to an heir with the inheritance, being such a thing as cannot be separated from the estate without injury to it, as jewels of the crown, charters, deeds, and the like. The term is sometimes loosely applied to personal property left by will or settled so as to descend like an heirloom proper; such property is distinctively called an heirloom by devise or a quasi-heirloom.

"I has been an heir-loom to our house four hundred years; And, should I leave it now, I fear good fortune Would flee from us, and follow it."
T. Tomkis (?), Albumazar, iii. 1.

Hence—2. Any personal possession that passes from generation to generation in a family or a community; any article or characteristic transmitted by ancestors.

Heirlooms, and ancient miracles of Art, Chalice, and silver. Tennyson, Lover's Tale, iv.

What practical man ever left such an heirloom to his countrymen as the "Faery Queen"?
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 166.

Of the many heirlooms that Venice has bequeathed, one of the best is the doctrine of the refined and noble use of color. C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 57.

heirship (ār'ship), n. [< heir + -ship.] The state or rights of an heir; right of inheriting.

I shall first review the laws of heirship by proximity of blood; and secondly, the laws of heirship by appointment.
Sir W. Jones, Commentary on Iseus.

Heirship movables, in Scots law, the best of certain kinds of movables which the heir is entitled to take, besides the heritable estate: a distinction abolished in 1868.

heise (héz), v. t. A dialectal variant of hoise. [Scotch.]

Heisteria (his-tē-rī-ä), n. [NL., named after Lorenz Heister (1683-1758), professor at Helmstedt.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, founded by Linnæus, of the natural order Olacineæ, characterized by a much enlarged free fruiting calyx, and twice as many stamens as petals, all bearing subglobose didymous anthers. They are shrubs or trees with entire coriaceous leaves and very small flowers fascicled in the axils. The fruit is a white drupe. The genus embraces upward of 20 species, natives of tropical Africa and America, chiefly the latter. H. coccinea, a native of the West Indies, is very ornamental in cultivation, and is called bois-perdrix (which may be a corruption of pois-perdrix) by the inhabitants of Martinique.

Heisteria (his-tē-rī-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Heisteria + -æ.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Olacineæ, proposed by Dumortier in 1829, of which the genus Heisteria was taken as the type. They are now embraced in the tribe Olacæ.

heisugget, n. A Middle English form of haysuck.

heitt, interj. See hait. Chaucer.

he-jalap (hē'jal'ap), n. A kind of jalap made from the plant Ipomœa Mestitanica (I. Orizabensis).

hejira (hej'i-rä), n. [Also written, less prop., hejira; = Turk. hejra = Pers. Hind. hijra, < Ar. hejira, hijra, the era of Mohammed, commemorating his flight from Mecca, lit. separation, departure; cf. hajr, separation, absence, < hajra, quit, leave.] A departure or flight; specifically, the departure of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina, A. D. 622, to escape the enmity of the Meccans; hence, the Mohammedan era, reckoned by lunar years of 354 and 355 days from July 16th, 622, though the true date of the event is supposed to be about June 19th.

hekt, n. See heck¹, hack².

Hekatombæion, n. See Hecatombæon.

hekistotherm (hē-kis'tō-thērm), n. [< Gr. ἡκιστός, least, worst (superl. (with compar. ἥσων), associated with κακός, bad, < ἥκα, still, low, little), + θερμῶν, heat.] One of Alphonse de Candolle's physiological groups in the geographical distribution of plants, denoting such as can subsist with the minimum of heat: commonly used in the plural. Hekistotherms are both boreal (arctic) and austral (antarctic).

hektograph, n. and v. See hectograph.

helcoid (hel'koid), a. [< Gr. ἑλκος, a wound, an ulcer (= L. ulcus: see ulcer) + εἶδος, form.] Resembling an ulcer; ulcerous.

helcology (hel-kol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. ἑλκος, an ulcer, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of pathology which is concerned with the study of ulcers.

helcoplasty (hel-kō-plas-tī), n. [< Gr. ἑλκος, an ulcer, + πλάσσις, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form, mold.] In surg., the operation of grafting on an ulcer a piece of skin from another part of the patient or from another person, in order to further the healing process.

held¹ (held). Preterit and past participle of hold¹.

held², heldet, v. Variants of heeld.

Helderbeg limestone. See limestone.

hele¹, v. and n. A Middle English form of heal¹.

hele², v. t. A Middle English form of heat².

helelest, a. See healless.

Helena (hel'e-nä), n. [< LGr. Ἑλένη or ἑλάνη, a torch, < Gr. Ἑλένη, Helen, in Greek legend the sister of Castor and Pollux and wife of Menelaus.] A meteoric appearance about the masts of ships. See corposant.

helen-flower (hel'en-flou'ēr), n. A plant of the genus Helenium.

Heleniæ (hel-ē-nī-ē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Helenium + -æ.] A subtribe of plants, of the natural order Compositæ, tribe Helanioideæ, typified by the genus Helenium, introduced by Gray in 1848. It is nearly equivalent to the Berariæ and Eubeheniæ of Bentham and Hooker. The involucre is hardly at all imbricated, the bracts are nearly equal, the disk flowers are numerous, and the achenia have few nerves or angles.

helenin, helenine (hel'ē-nin), n. [< helen-ium + -in², -ine².] A substance (C₆H₈O) derived from the root of Inula helenium, or elecampane, by the action of alcohol. It crystallizes in white prisms which have a bitter taste.

helenioid (he-lē-nī-oid), a. [< Helenium + -oid.] In bot., resembling Helenium; belonging to the tribe Helanioideæ, of the order Compositæ.

Helanioideæ (he-lē-nī-oi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Helenium + -oideæ.] A tribe of composite plants, typified by the genus Helenium. It was introduced by Bentham and Hooker in 1873, who limited it, in the main, to the following characters: the heads heterogamous and radiate; the receptacle naked; the anthers unappressed; the achenia narrow or turbinate, having four or five angles or eight or more ribs, and provided with chaff; the bracts of the involucre in one or two rows; and both the disk and ray flowers yellow.

The tribe embraces 63 genera, mostly coarse herbs or suffrutescent plants, chiefly American, found especially in California to Chili, but most abundant in Mexico.

helenium (he-lē-ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. Ἑλένη, a plant, perhaps elecampane, prob. < Ἑλένη, Helen, wife of Menelaus.] 1. Elecampane: used as a specific name.—2. [cap.] A genus of composite plants, founded by Linnæus in 1753, the type of the tribe Helanioideæ. It is characterized by radiate heads, narrow involucre bracts in one or two series, reflexed after flowering, and truncate branches of the style. It comprises herbs with alternate, often decurrent, chiefly entire leaves, and peduncled solitary or loosely corymbose heads of yellow flowers. There are about 18 species, natives of North and Central America. The best-known species, H. autumnale, is common in alluvial bottoms of the eastern United States, and is called sneezeweed, from its effect on the nose. The leaves and flowers snuffed up in the state of powder produce violent sneezing, and have been used as an erethic. It is also called false sunflower. H. tenuifolium of the southern United States is said to be very poisonous, producing spasms and loss of consciousness.

Heleocharis (hel-ē-ok'ä-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλος (ēlos), a marsh, + χαίρειν, rejoice.] A genus of monocotyledonous glumaceous plants, of the natural order Cyperaceæ and tribe Scirpeæ, founded by Robert Brown in 1810. It is characterized by from 2 to 8 hypogynous bristles, the persistent bulbous base of the style crowning the achenium, leafless stems, and solitary terminal spikes, the lowest bracts being glumaceous. The genus embraces about 90 species, diffused throughout the entire globe. They are collectively called spike-rushes, and are closely related to the bulrushes and club-rushes (Scirpus), though smaller, and like them grow in wet, marshy places. H. palustris, common to both Europe and America, is one of the most abundant species. H. tuberosa, a Chinese species, has edible tubers, and is called matai or petsi. H. sphacelata, of Australia, New Zealand, and the South Sea Islands, also has nutritious and palatable tubers. Also Eleocharis.

helgramite, n. See hellygrammite.

heliac (hē-li-ak), a. [= F. héliacque = Sp. heliaco = Pg. heliaco = It. eliac, < LL. heliacus, < Gr. ἡλιακός, of the sun, < ἥλιος, the sun, Doric ἄλιος, ἄλιος, Epic ἥλιος, ἥλιος, Cretic, Laconic ἄβῆλιος, orig. prob. ἄβῆλιος*, ἄβῆλιος* = Etruscan Usil, the sun-god, whence, according to Festus, the Roman plebeian name Ausilius, Aurelius; connected with Gr. ἥος, Doric ἄος, Lesbian ἄως, Attic ἑως = L. aurora, the dawn, = E. easter, etc., L. aurum, gold, etc.: see aurora, aurum, east, Easter¹, Eocene, etc. L. sol, the sun, is of different origin: see sol, solar.] Same as heliacal.

heliacal (hē-li-ä-kal), a. [< heliac + -al.] In old astron. and chronol., near the sun: applied to those risings and settings of a star which were as nearly coincident with those of the sun as they could be observed. The stars rise and set a little earlier each successive day. The first rising of a star each year in time to be seen before sunrise is the heliacal rising; its last observable setting after sunset is the heliacal setting. From the time of a star's heliacal setting to that of its heliacal rising it is too near the sun to be seen at all—a period of 30 or 40 days, according to the reckoning of the ancients.

The cosmical ascension of a star we term that, when it ariseth together with the sun, or the same degree of the ecliptic wherein the sun abideth; and that the heliacal, when a star which before for the vicinity of the sun was not visible, being further removed, beginneth to appear.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 13.

heliacally (hē-li-ä-kal-i), adv. In a heliacal manner.

He [Orion] is tempestuous in summer, when he rises heliacally.
Dryden, Epic Poetry.

heliæa (hē-li-ē-ä), n. [Gr. ἡλιαία, a public place or hall, in which the chief court of law sat at Athens.] In Athenian antiqu. (a) The institution of the dicastræ. (b) The chief of the courts (called heliastic), in which cases of high importance were tried. See dicastræ.

helianthaceous (hē-li-an-thä'shūns), a. [< Helianthus + -aceous.] In bot., related to Helianthus; belonging to the Heliantheæ or Helianthoideæ.

Heliantheæ (hē-li-an-thē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Gray, 1848), < Helianthus + -æ.] A subtribe of the Compositæ, coming under the tribe Senecionideæ, and embracing Helianthus and allied genera. Baillon ("Histoire des Plantes," VIII. 71, 201) gives this name to a much larger group, which he calls a series, embracing most genera with heterogamous heads.

Helianthemum (hē-li-an-thē-mum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1717), < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + ἄνθεον, a flower, < ἄθος, a flower.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Cistineæ, characterized by a three-valved capsule with three placenta and a twice-plicate uncinat embryo. The genus embraces about 35 species, natives of North and South America, Europe, and western Asia. They are low herbs or suffrutescent plants with flowers in terminal (or the lower in axillary) racemes, and the very thin petals often large, and showy. H. vulgare, the common European species, is called rock-rose, or, in some of the old herbals, sunflower, from the fact that the flowers open only in sunshine. It is extensively cultivated, and is the original of all the double varieties of rock-rose in gardens. H. Canadense, the frostweed, is common in the eastern United States, and has large yellow flowers.

Helianthideæ (hē-li-an-thid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Helianthus (-id-) + -æ.] A tribe of plants, typified by the genus Helianthus, proposed by Dumortier in 1829. See Helianthoideæ.

Helium autumnale.

helianthin (hē-li-an'thin), n. [Helianthus, sunflower, + *-in*².] A coal-tar color used in dyeing. It is the ammonia salt of dimethyl-aniline-azobenzene-sulphonic acid. It produces a fiery orange on silk and wool. Also called gold orange.

helianthoid (hē-li-an'thoid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Helianthoidea; resembling a sea-anemone; zoantharian.

Solitary polypes—hydroid or helianthoid—... do not by locomotion subject their bodies to habitual contractions of condition. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 240.

II. n. One of the Helianthoidea.

Also Helianthoidea.

Helianthoidea (hē'li-an-thoi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Helianthus + -oidea.] An order or some similar group of malacostracous or soft-bodied anthozoan or polychaetous polyps, of the class Actinozoa; the sea-anemones, in a broad sense, represented by the Actiniidae and related families. Groups more or less exactly synonymous are Actiniaria, Hexacoralla, and Malacostracata. Also Helianthoidea.

Helianthoidea (hē'li-an-thoi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Helianthus + -oidea.] A tribe of plants established by Bentham and Hooker, belonging to the natural order Compositae, distinguished by a chaffy receptacle, anthers mostly sagittate, pappus never of fine bristles, and leaves commonly opposite. It embraces about 150 genera, found in both hemispheres. The typical genus is Helianthus.

helianthoidean (hē'li-an-thoi'dē-ē), a. and n. Same as helianthoid.

Helianthus (hē-li-an'thus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753) (cf. L. helianthes), < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of plants, including the common sunflower, belonging to the natural order Compositae, tribe Helianthoidea, of which it is the type. It is characterized by yellow sterile rays (rarely wanting), yellow or purple disk-flowers, a chaffy receptacle, and 2 (rarely 3 or 4) caducous awns of the pappus. The genus consists of about 50 species of annual or perennial herbs, natives of America, largely of North America.

Flowering Branch, Root, and Tubers of Jerusalem Artichoke (Helianthus tuberosus). a, ray-flower; b, disk-flower; c, fruit.

The common sunflower is now known to be indigenous in North America and identical with H. lenticularis of Douglas. In the wild state its seeds have always constituted an important part of the food of the Indians of the far west. An oil is expressed from them. The leaves serve for fodder, the flowers yield a large amount of honey as well as a durable yellow dye, and the stalks furnish a textile fiber. Some species are tuber-bearing, especially H. tuberosus, the Jerusalem artichoke, and its near ally H. doronicoides.

Helias (hē-li-as), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος, of the sun, < ἥλιος, the sun: see heliac.] Same as Helioris, 1 (b).

heliast (hē-li-as't), n. [Gr. ἡλιαστής, < ἡλιαία: see heliaea.] In ancient Athens, one of the body of qualified citizens annually chosen to sit as judges in the courts; a dicast.

The authority which was to be taken from the Areopagus being of a political as well as a judicial character, an oath was required from the heliasts, by which they bound themselves, above all things, to favor neither tyranny nor oligarchy, nor in any way to prejudice the sovereignty of the people. Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 203.

Helianther (hē-li-as'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος, sun, + ἄνθη, star.] A genus of many-rayed starfishes, of the family Asteriidae, containing such species as H. kubiński and H. microbrachia, of the Pacific coast of North America; the sun-stars.

heliastic (hē-li-as'tik), a. [Gr. heliast + -ic.] Pertaining to, or pertaining to the heliasts or their functions.

Elaboration and subtlety could have no place in addressing the Helio court. Encyc. Brit., XIX, 198.

helical (hel'ī-kal), a. [Gr. helix (helice) + -al.] Pertaining to or having the form of a helix.

helically (hel'ī-kal-i), adv. In the form of a helix.

Helicea, Heliceæ (hē-lis'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Helix (Helice) + -ea, -eæ.] Same as Helicidae. heliced (hē'list), a. [L. helix (helice), helix, + *-ed*².] Having helices; decorated with helices. [Rare.]

A tholus or dome, which is richly ornamented, and terminates in a foliated and heliced acroterium. Encyc. Brit., II, 411.

helices, n. Plural of helix.

Helichrysæ (hē-li-kris'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Helichrysum + -eæ.] In Lindley's system (1845), a tribe of plants, of the order Asteraceæ, having Helichrysum as the type, and nearly equivalent to the Inuloidæ of the natural order Compositæ.

Helichrysum (hē-li-kri'sum), n. [NL. (Gärtner, 1791), irreg. < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + χρυσός, golden.] A large genus of composite plants, of the tribe Inuloidæ, characterized by its commonly yellow flowers, naked receptacle, setose pappus, very conspicuous colored and petaloid involucre, and generally alternate entire leaves. The genus embraces about 270 species of herbaceous or shrubby plants, natives of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australasia. The parts of the flower persist after drying, which has gained for these plants the name of everlasting or immortelles, and they are in common use in funeral wreaths, crosses, etc. Among the commoner species in cultivation are H. lucidum, H. angustifolium, and H. odoratissimum. H. arvense affords herbage in the worst deserts of Australia. H. serratifolium of South Africa is known as Hottentot's tea, and H. nudifolium, from the same region, is called Kafir-tea.

Helicia (hē-lis'ī-ā), n. [NL. (Loureiro, 1790), so called from the spirally revolute segments of the perianth, < Gr. ἥλιξ, a spiral: see helix.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, of the natural order Proteaceæ, distinguished by the slender tube of the perianth, and four spatulate segments, each bearing an anther. The fruit is hard, indehiscent, nearly globose, and contains one or two seeds. The genus comprises about 25 species of trees and shrubs with mostly alternate leaves, natives of tropical Asia to Japan, and Australia. H. prealtia of Queensland is a lofty tree, attaining a height of 100 feet. The Queensland nut-tree, formerly known as H. ternstrofia, is now referred to the genus Macadamia (which see). Impressions of leaves belonging to this genus have been found in the Miocene of Italy and the Oligocene of Styria; and two fossil species, H. ambigua and H. soliziana, have been described.

Helicidæ (hē-lis'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Helix (Helice) + -idæ.] A family of geophilous pulmonate gastropods, typified by the genus Helix. It has been used with varying limits. Formerly it included all or almost all the inoperculate shell-bearing forms, and according to some the shell-less forms (slugs). Later it was more and more restricted, and is now generally confined to species with an entire jaw, the marginal teeth of the radula bicuspid or tricuspid and transverse, and a spiral shell into which the soft parts are retractile. It is a very large assemblage of land-shells of cosmopolitan distribution and of considerable range of variation. See cuts under Bulimus, Gasteropoda, and Pulmonata. Also Helicea, Heliceæ, and Colimacidae.

heliciform (hē-lis'ī-fōrm), a. [Gr. ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral (see helix), + L. forma, shape.] Having the form of a helix; helical.

helicine (hel'ī-sin), a. [Gr. ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral (see helix), + *-inē*¹.] In anat.: (a) Coiled as, the helicine arteries (the small coiling arterial twigs of the penis or clitoris). (b) Pertaining to the helix of the ear: as, the helicine fossa.

helicinian (hel-i-sin'ī-an), a. [Gr. helicine + -ian.] In conch., helicine.

helicite (hel'ī-sit), n. [Gr. ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral (see helix), + *-ite*².] A fossil snail-shell, as a species of Helix or some related genus.

helicograph (hel'ī-kō-graf), n. [Gr. ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral (see helix), + γράφειν, write.] A drawing-instrument for describing a spiral line. A small wheel carrying a pencil rotates on a screw-shaft, and revolves around a fixed point, moving toward or from the center, according to the direction of revolution.

Helicograph.

helicogyræ (hel'ī-kō-jī-rāt), a. [Gr. ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral (see helix), + γύρος, a ring, circle: see helix and gyre.] In bot., surrounded by an obliquely placed ring, as the spore-cases of Trichomanes.

helicoid (hē-lī-koid), a. and n. [Gr. ἥλικος, of winding or spiral form, < ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral (see helix), + εἶδος, form.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or having the form of a helix; screw-shaped; coiled like a helix. See cut under Fora- minifera. Also helicoidal.—2. In conch., pertaining to or resembling the Helicoidæ.—Helicoid cyme, in bot., same as bostryx.—Helicoid dichotomy, in bot., a term proposed by Sachs for a certain form of the branching of stems in which the sympodium is composed entirely of left-hand or entirely of right-hand branches, as the case may be. It is largely a hypothetical condition, and its actual occurrence in nature is doubtful, although it is possibly found in the leaf of Adiantum pedatum.—Helicoid parabola, in math., the curve which arises when the axis of the common parabola is bent round into the periphery of a circle, and which is a line then passing through the extremities of the ordinates, which converge toward the center of the circle.—Helicoid spores, in bot., spores that are coiled more or less in the form of a helix, as in the genus Helicoma.

II. n. In geom., any one of several different surfaces. See the phrases below.—Developable helicoid, a surface all the generators of which are the tangents to a fixed helix.—Oblique helicoid, a warped surface every generatrix of which passes through a fixed helix and makes a constant angle with its axis.—Right helicoid, a developable surface every generator of which passes through a fixed helix, and is perpendicular to its axis.

helicoidal (hel-i-koi'dal), a. [Gr. helicoid + -al.] Same as helicoid, 1.

The screw consists of two helicoidal pallets covered with varnished silk, the deformation of which is guarded against by the action of coils of steel wire.

Science, III, 54.

helicometry (hel-i-kom'e-tri), n. [Gr. ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral (see helix), + μέτρον, measure.] The art of measuring or drawing spiral lines on a plane.

helicon (hel'ī-kon), n. [Gr. ἑλικόν, a nine-stringed instrument, appar. the same as ἑλικόν, the thread spun from the distaff to the spindle, < ἥλιξ (ἥλικ), a spiral, a helix: see helix.] In music: (a) An ancient acoustical instrument, consisting of several strings so disposed upon a resonance-box that their lengths could be geometricaly adjusted, and thus various musical intervals demonstrated. (b) A recently invented brass wind-instrument, used in bands. It is a spiral tube of large size, and is carried over the shoulder. Its lowest note is two octaves below F or E flat in the bass clef.

Helicon, def. (b).

Heliconæ (hel-i-kō'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Heliconia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Musaceæ, formed by Lindley in 1845, who restricted it to the single genus Heliconia.

Heliconia (hel-i-kō'ni-ā), n. [NL., fem. of L. Heliconius: see Heliconian.] 1. Same as Heliconius.—2. A genus of monocotyledonous plants founded by Linnæus in 1767, belonging to the natural order Musaceæ, and characterized by free sepals, short corolla-tube, and ovary-cells having one ovule. They are nearly herbaceous, banana-like plants with terminal inflorescence. There are about 25 species, natives of tropical America, 5 of which are found in the West Indies, where they are called bastard plantain. The shoots of H. psittacorum and the fruit of H. Bihai are edible. H. Maria-Alexandrovna, named after the Empress of Russia, is a native of the United States of Colombia, attains a height of from 12 to 15 feet, and furnishes a useful fiber. It is very ornamental, bearing a spike of red flowers 2½ feet in length.

Heliconian (hel-i-kō'ni-an), a. [L. Heliconius, < Gr. ἑλικωνίος, of Helicón, < ἑλικόν, Helicon: see def.] Pertaining to or obtained from Helicon, a mountain of Boeotia in Greece, from which flowed Aganippe and Hippocrene, two fountains sacred to the Muses. It was held to be a favorite retreat of Apollo and the Muses.

Shutting reasons up in rhythm,
Or Heliconian honey in living words,
To make a truth less harsh.

Tennyson, Lucretius.

The Heliconian maids, the Muses.

The Heliconian Maids in pleasant groves delight.
Drayton, Polyolbion, v. 223.

heliconideous (hel'ī-kō-nid'ē-us), a. Of or pertaining to the Heliconiidae.

Species of Heliconia mimic Mechanitis, and every species of Napeogenes mimics some other Heliconiidae butterfly. A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 85.

Heliconiidae (hel'ī-kō-nid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Heliconius + -idæ.] The Heliconiinae rated as a family. Also written Heliconiidae.

Heliconiinae (hel-i-kō-ni'ī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Heliconius + -inæ.] A subfamily group of vanessoid butterflies, containing the American genera Heliconius and Eueides, with produced wings, closed discoidal cellule, proportionately long antennae and abdomen, and slender legs. Heliconiinae (hel-i-kō'nin), n. [Same as Heliconiidae.] Heliconius (hel-i-kō'ni-us), n. [NL., < L. Heliconius, of Helicon: see Heliconian.] The typical genus of the subfamily Heliconiinae. Also Heliconia.

Heliconoid (hel-i-kō'noid), a. [< Helicon-ius + -oid.] Resembling or related to butterflies of the genus Heliconius; belonging to the Heliconiinae.

The immense variety of the Heliconoid butterflies.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 355.

heliocophyt (hel-i-kos'ō-fī), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος (ēlios), a spiral (see helix), + σφῆρα, wisdom. Cf. philosophy.] The geometry of spiral curves.

Heliocophy is an arte mathematica which demonstrates the designing of all spiral lines in plain or cylinder, cone, sphere, conoid, and spheroid, and their properties appertaining. Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1870).

helicotrema (hel'i-kō-trē'mā), n.; pl. helicotre-mata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος (ēlios), a spiral (see helix), + τρήμα, a hole.] In anat., the opening at the summit of the cochlea where the scala vestibuli and scala tympani communicate.

Helicterea (hel-ik-tē'rē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Helictes + -ea.] A tribe of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, of the natural order Sterculiaceae, distinguished by its hermaphrodite flowers, with 5 deciduous petals, and generally from 5 to 15 anthers on a column. The tribe embraces about 6 genera of trees and shrubs, natives of the tropical regions of both hemispheres.

Helictes (hel-ik-tē'rēs), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737) (so named with ref. to the twisted carpels), < Gr. ἑλκῆρ, anything twisted or spiral, as an armlet, an ear-ring, etc., < ἑλίσσιν, turn round or about, twist: see helix.] A genus of plants, belonging to the tribe Helicterea. They are trees and shrubs covered with branching or stellate down, with simple heart-shaped leaves, and axillary flowers, generally in clusters. The stamens are united into a column, bearing the anthers at the top. The fruit is composed of 5 carpels twisted together. The genus comprises more than 40 species, inhabiting the warmer regions of both hemispheres. H. Isora of India and H. Jamaicensis of the West Indies are the best-known species, both of which are called screev-tree. The fruit is called twisted-stick, twisted-horn, or twisty, and is supposed by the natives of India to be a remedy for colic.

Helictidinae (he-lik-ti-dī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Helictis (-id-) + -inae.] A subfamily of carnivorous quadrupeds, of the family Mustelidae, typified by the genus Helictis. The auditory bullae are elongated and closely applied to the paracipitals, the palate is moderately emarginate, the back upper molar is transverse with a narrow inner ledge, and the sectorial tooth has two inner cusps.

Helictis (he-lik'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. (prob.) ἑλος, marsh, + ἰκτίς, a kind of weasel.] The typical genus of the family Mustelidae, the type of a Helictis moschata.

subfamily Helictidinae, containing such species as the Chinese H. moschata and the Indian H. nepalensis.

heligt, n. An obsolete form of healing.
Helicarpus (hē'li-ō-kār'pus), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Malvaceae, tribe Grewieae. It is chiefly characterized by its compressed 2-valved capsule, which is ciliated round the margin with a row of radiating bristles. The genus embraces some 4 or 5 species of trees or shrubs with 3-lobed serrate leaves, and small flowers in cymes which are arranged in a terminal panicle. They are natives of tropical America. The resemblance of the fruits to little suns is expressed in the generic name as well as in the popular name, sun-fruit, by which these plants are known.

heliocentric (hē'li-ō-sen'trik), a. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + κέντρον, center.] In astron., referred to the sun as a center; appearing as if seen from the sun's center. The heliocentric place of a planet is the place it would occupy in the celestial sphere if viewed from the center of the sun. The heliocentric latitude of a planet is the inclination of a line drawn between the center of the sun and the center of the planet to the plane of the ecliptic. The heliocentric longitude of a planet is the angle between two lines drawn from the sun, one in the direction of the first of Aries, the other to the foot of a perpendicular which is dropped from the planet upon the plane of the ecliptic, the angle being measured eastward from the first of Aries.

Copernicus had satisfied himself of the truth of the Heliocentric Theory. Whewell.

heliocentric (hē'li-ō-sen'trik), a. [< helio- + centric + -al.] Same as heliocentric.

heliocentricity (hē'li-ō-sen'tris'i-ti), n. [< helio- + centric + -ity.] The state or condition of being heliocentric; relation to the sun as a center.

Until the Copernicans have convinced the Ptolemaists, our readers may as well refuse to acknowledge the heliocentricity of things. N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 163.

heliocchromic (hē'li-ō-krō'mik), a. [< helio- + chromy + -ic.] Pertaining to, used in, or produced by heliochromy.

Yellow is found very difficult to transfer to the heliocchromic plate at the same time with other colors. Silver Sunbeam, p. 22.

heliocchromotype (hē'li-ō-krō'mō-tip), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + χρώμα, color, + τύπος, impression.] A photograph which reproduces the natural colors of the object. Such photographs have not yet (1889) been obtained in permanent form by any direct process.

heliocchromy (hē'li-ō-krō'mi), n. [As heliocchromy* (< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + χρώμα, color) + -y.] In photog., the art of producing photographs in the natural colors.

heliocchrysin (hē'li-ō-krī'sin), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + χρυσός, gold, + -in.] A coal-tar color used in dyeing. It is the sodium salt of tetranitronaphthol. It dyes fine shades on wool and silk, but is not fast to light, and is of little technical importance. Also called sun-gold.

heliocomete (hē'li-ō-kōm'ēt), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + κομήτης, a comet: see comet.] An appearance of a tail of light attached to the sun and visible after its setting.

helioid (hē'li-ōd), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + Ε. ὄδ, q. v.] The supposed odd force of the sun. Von Reichenbach.

helioc-electric (hē'li-ō-ē-lek'trik), a. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + E. electric.] Pertaining to terrestrial electrical phenomena as caused by the sun.

The helioc-electric theory of the perturbations of terrestrial magnetism. Nature, XXX. 47.

helioc-engraving (hē'li-ō-en-grā'ving), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + E. engraving.] Same as heliogravure.

The helioc-engraving by etching was brought to a high degree of completion by Klic, of Vienna, in 1883. Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 49.

heliograph (hē'li-ō-grāf), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + γράφειν, write.] 1. A heliotrope; especially, a movable mirror used in signaling, surveying, etc., to flash a beam of light to a distance. In signaling the flashes are caused to follow one another in accordance with a signal-code. The mirror is mounted on a tripod, and has a part of the silvering removed from the back at the center. Two sights are provided in front with a screen. The tripod is set up, and a distant station is sighted through the hole in the mirror. The beam of light is then directed through both sights, and is seen at the distant station. By means of the Morse key, which causes the mirror to move through a limited arc, telegraphic signals can be flashed to a distance of many miles.

2. In photog.: (a) An instrument for taking photographs of the sun. (b) A picture taken by heliography; a photograph.

heliograph (hē'li-ō-grāf), v. t. [< heliograph, n.] 1. To communicate or signal by means of a heliograph.

There were all the means of heliographing at Korti. Athenæum, Jan. 7, 1888, p. 10.

2. To photograph.

When the cloth tracings have to be heliographed, raw sienna is also added to the ink. Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 192.

heliographer (hē-li-ōg'rā-fēr), n. One who practises heliography.

heliographic (hē'li-ō-grāf'ik), a. [< heliograph, n. + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the heliograph. — 2. Of or pertaining to heliography, in any sense of that word. — Heliographic engraving, an early photo-engraving process invented by Niepce de St. Victor. A metallic plate was coated with bitumen and placed beneath and in contact with a line-engraving, and exposed to light. By the combined action of light and the oxygen of the air the parts of the bitumen between the lines of the engraving were rendered insoluble to the ordinary solvent, which would, however, act upon the unchanged parts beneath the lines, dissolving them, and laying bare the metal, which could then be etched with acid, freed from its bituminous covering, and used in printing. See etching, photo-engraving. — Heliographic latitude and longitude, coordinates of points on the sun referred to the axis of revolution of that luminary and to the node of its equator upon the ecliptic.

heliographical (hē'li-ō-grāf'i-kal), a. [< heliographic + -al.] Same as heliographic.

The period of rotation seems . . . to vary somewhat in different years even for [solar] spots in the same heliographical latitude. Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 290.

heliography (hē-li-ōg'rā-fī), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + γράφω, < γράφειν, write.] 1. A method of signaling between distant points by means of the heliograph. — 2. In general, photography; specifically, some special photographic process; photographic engraving. See the extract, and heliographic engraving, under heliographic.

Niepce, in his experiments, discarded the use of the silver salts, and substituted in their place a resinous substance denominated the "Bitumen of Judea." He named his process Heliography, or "Sun-drawing." Silver Sunbeam, p. 14.

3. The description and mapping of the surface of the sun.

heliogravure (hē'li-ō-grā'vūr or hā'li-ō-grā'vūr), n. [< F. heliogravure, < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + F. gravure, engraving.] Photo-engraving, or a print obtained by this process; strictly, a photo-engraved metal plate. See heliotype and photo-engraving. Also called helioc-engraving.

helioid (hē'li-ōid), a. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, < ἥλιος, the sun, + εἶδος, form.] Resembling the sun.

heliolater (hē-li-ol'ā-tēr), n. [< heliolat-ry + -er.] A worshiper of the sun.

heliolatrous (hē-li-ol'ā-trus), a. [< heliolat-ry + -ous.] Worshipping the sun.

heliolatry (hē-li-ol'ā-trī), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + λατρεία, worship.] The worship of the sun. See sun-worship.

heliolite (hē'li-ō-lit), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + λίθος, a stone.] Same as sunstone.

heliology (hē-li-ol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of the sun.

It would be useful to write a paper on the evolution of sunrayism, or perhaps of heliology, and to show how the ideas of a sun as a fountain of light and heat and chemical force arose. Spectator, April 24, 1888, p. 546.

heliometer (hē-li-om'ē-tēr), n. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + μέτρον, a measure.] An astronomical instrument, consisting of a telescope having its objective sawed across in a plane passing through the optical axis, and each part arranged to move by sliding past the other, its exact position being shown by a micrometer-screw. Each half of the objective forms its own image of a star, this image moving with the half-objective which forms it. Thus, the image of one star, formed by one half of the objective, can be brought into coincidence with the image of another, formed by the other half, and by means of the micrometer the distance apart of the half-lenses, and consequently the angular distance of the two stars, can be very accurately measured, while the position-angle is determined by the direction of the line of separation of the semi-lenses. This instrument is much employed in investigations into the parallax of the fixed stars, as well as for other purposes. As its name implies, it was originally devised for measuring the diameter of the sun.

heliometric (hē'li-ō-met'rik), a. [As heliometer + -ic.] Pertaining to or ascertained or made by means of the heliometer; also, relating to measurements of the sun.

The publication of the photographic and heliometric results is waited for with much interest. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 25.

heliometrical (hē'li-ō-met'ri-kal), a. [< heliometric + -al.] Same as heliometric.

heliometrically (hē'li-ō-met'ri-kal-i), adv. By means of the heliometer; by the heliometric method.

heliophag (hē'li-ō-fag), n. [As heliophagous.] In biol., any heliophagous part or substance of an animal, as a pigment-cell. [Rare.]

But in animals it is probable that the pigment granules are only the receivers of energy — the heliophag, as we shall call them. Micros. Science, XXVII. 287.

heliophagous (hē-li-ōf'ā-gus), a. [< Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + φαγέιν, eat, devour, + -ous.] Receiving and absorbing the energy of sunlight, or solar heat, in some special (chemical) manner. The chlorophyll of plants and the pigment-cells of animals are heliophagous. [Rare.]

The concentration of light is stated to be the condition essential for the most perfect heliophagous organ. Micros. Science, XXVII. 290.

Heliophila (hē-li-ōf'i-lā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + φίλος, loving.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Cruciferae, tribe Sisymbryeae, founded by Linnaeus and consisting of about 40 species of South African herbs or shrubs with alternate leaves, racemes of white, pink, or blue flowers having the sepals equal at the base, and pendulous or deflexed pods. This and the closely allied genus Chamira were erected into a tribe (Heliophileae) by the elder De Candolle, on account of their transversely folded cotyledons.

Heliophileae (hē'li-ō-fil'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1821), < Heliophila + -eae.] A tribe of cruciferous plants, of which Heliophila is the typical genus.

Heliophilidae (hē'li-ō-fil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Heliophila + -idae.] In Lindley's system (1845), a tribe of plants, of the order Brassicaceae, embracing the genera Heliophila and Chamira, now included in the tribe Sisymbryae of the natural order Cruciferae.

heliophilous (hē-li-ōf'i-lus), a. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + φίλος, loving, + -ous.] Fond of the sun; attracted by or becoming more active in sunlight.

heliophobic (hē'li-ō-fō'bik), a. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + φοβέσθαι, fear.] Fearing or shunning sunlight.

A heliophobic spore may often find enough of shade among the rhizoids of other pre-existing weeds, . . . so that finally a round exposed protuberance may be entirely covered with algae whose spores are negatively heliotropic. Trans. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh, XXXII, 598.

Heliopora (hē'li-ō-pō'rā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + πόρος, tufa, a stalactite, etc.] The typical genus of Helioporidae. De Blainville, 1830.

Heliopora seems to differ from all the other Alcyonarians except Corallium. H. N. Moseley.

heliopore (hē'li-ō-pōr), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Helioporidae; etc.

II. n. A sun-coral; a member of the genus Heliopora or family Helioporidae.

Helioporidae (hē'li-ō-pōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Heliopora + -idae.] A family of corals of disputed affinities; the sun-corals. By some they are placed with the milleporines (Hydrocorallinae), by others referred to the poropora (Aleporaria) and placed near the common red coral of commerce.

Helioporinae (hē'li-ō-pō-rī-nē), n. pl. The sun-corals as a subfamily of Milleporidae. J. D. Dana, 1846.

Heliopsisidae (hē'li-ōp-sid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Heliopsis (-id-) + -eae.] A division of the natural order Compositae, made by Cassini, with Heliopsis as the typical genus.

Heliopsis (hē-li-ōp'sis), n. [NL. (Persoon, 1807), < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + ὄψις, likeness.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Compositae and tribe Helianthoideae, distinguished by its ligulate fertile rays, hermaphrodite disk-flowers, and chaffy conical receptacle without pappus.

The plants are mostly perennial herbs, with showy yellow flowers, pedunculate heads, and ovate, petioled, opposite leaves. The genus comprises about 7 species, inhabiting North and South America. H. laevis, common in the eastern United States, resembles Helianthus, and is called oysen.

Heliornis (hē-li-ōr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + ὄρνις, a bird.] 1. In ornith.: (a) A genus of lobed birds, typical of the family Heliothidae; the South American sun-birds. There is but one species, H. surinamensis or H.

glasses blackened by smoke, or with mirrors formed simply of surfaces of transparent glass, which reflect but a small proportion of light.

helioscopic (hē'li-ō-skōp'ik), a. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + -scopos, to look at.] Pertaining to or made by means of a helioscope: as, helioscopic observations.

heliosis (hē-li-ō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + -iosis, to be exposed to.] 1. In bot., the production of burned patches or spots on leaves by the concentration of the rays of the sun through inequalities of the glass of conservatories, or through drops of water resting on the leaves. In the latter case the destruction is not as complete as in the former, the chlorophyll being merely altered, not destroyed. These spots furnish a suitable habitation for many minute fungi, which are often regarded as the cause of them.

2. In med.: (a) Treatment of disease in certain cases by exposure to the rays of the sun. (b) Sunstroke.

heliospherical (hē'li-ō-sfer'ik-al), a. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + σφαῖρικός, spherical: see spheric, spherical.] Round as the sun.

heliostat (hē'li-ō-stat), n. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + στατός, fixed, < στάναι, set up, stand: see static.] An instrument consisting of a mirror carried by clockwork in such a way as to reflect the sun's rays in a fixed direction. The name is also improperly applied to a porte-lumière.

Heliostat. M, mirror.

helioid (hē-li-ō'id), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Heliothidae.

Even Agrotis takes a distinct helioid tendency in the tuberculate front and heavily armed fore-tibia of the western species. Science, IV, 64.

II. n. One of the Heliothidae.

Heliothis (hē-li-ō'this), n. [NL., < Heliothis + -idae.] A family of noctuid moths, typified by the genus Heliothis. Also written Heliothides and Heliothidi.

Heliothis (hē-li-ō'this), n. [NL. (Ochsenheimer, 1816), prob. for Heliothis*, < Gr. ἥλιος, prop. adj., fem. of ἥλιος, of the sun, but used as a noun, the moon, < ἥλιος, the sun.] A genus of noctuid moths, giving name to the family Heliothidae. The antennae are pubescent, the thorax and abdomen smooth and not tufted, and the fore wings slightly angulated. The best-known species is H. armigera, which is widely distributed in both the old and the new world. It is usually of a pale clay-color, with the Heliothis armigera.

a, b, egg, side and top views; c, caterpillar; d, chrysalis in earthen cocoon; e, f, moth with wings expanded and closed. (All, except a and b, of natural size.)

fore wings variegated with pale-olive and dark-rufous, a dark spot in the middle of the wing being especially conspicuous. The larva, known as the boll-worm and corn-worm, is very variable in color, but is always marked with longitudinal dark and light lines and covered with black scitigerous spots. It is especially injurious to the fruit of cotton, maize, and the tomato. H. marginata is known as the bordered sailer.

heliotrope (hē'li-ō-trōp), n. [Also heliotropion, q. v.; = F. heliotrope = Sp. Pg. heliotropio = It. eliotropio, < L. heliotropium, < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + τροπή, a turning, turn, < τροπή, a turning, turn, < τροπή, a turning.] 1. In astron., an instrument for showing when the sun arrives at the solstitial points.

An obelisk in a garden or park might be both an embellishment and a heliotrope.

Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, xlv.

2. A mirror arranged with a telescope and sights so as to flash a reflection of the sun to a great distance. The instrument is used in geodetic triangulation to mark a station. See heliograph, 1.

Luminous signals—argand lamps by night and heliotropes by day—are exclusively used in the Great Survey of India. Clarke, Geodesy, p. 33.

3. A plant of the genus Heliotropium, of the natural order Boraginaceae. The species are herbs or shrubs, mostly natives of the warmer parts of the world. They have alternate leaves and small purplish or lilac flowers usually disposed in scorpioid cymes. One species, H. Eurropeum, is a common European weed. H. Peruvianum, the Peruvian heliotrope, has long been a favorite garden-plant, on account of the fragrance of its flowers. The name has also been given to a composite plant. Also called turnsol.

'Tis an observation of flatterers that they are like the heliotrope; they open only toward the sun, but shut and contract themselves . . . in cloudy weather.

Government of the Tongue.

The roses, the mignonette, the heliotropes, all combined their fragrance to refresh the air.

T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

4. The bluish-purple or pinkish-lilac color of some flowers of the heliotrope.—5. A mineral, a subspecies of quartz, of a deep-green color, peculiarly pleasant to the eye. It is usually variegated with blood-red or yellowish dots of jasper, and is more or less translucent. Also called blood-stone.—False heliotrope, Tournefortia heliotropoides. See Tournefortia.—Indian heliotrope, Heliotropium Indicum.—Winter heliotrope, Petasites fragrans, a composite plant.

heliotroper (hē'li-ō-trō-pēr), n. A person employed to manipulate a heliotrope or heliograph.

Heliotropes were also employed at the observing stations to flash instructions to the signallers. Encyc. Brit., XXII, 698.

heliotropic (hē'li-ō-trōp'ik), a. [As heliotrop-y + -ic.] Turning or tending to turn toward the sun; specifically, of, pertaining to, or characterized by heliotropism.

heliotropical (hē'li-ō-trōp'ik-al), a. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + -tropos, to turn, < τροπή, a turning.] Same as heliotropic.

heliotropically (hē'li-ō-trōp'ik-al-i), adv. In a heliotropic manner; by or with heliotropism. Darwin.

Heliotropiæ (hē'li-ō-trōp'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Heliotropium + -eae.] A tribe of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, of the natural order Boraginaceae, distinguished mainly by the style, which is generally entire, with the stigma forming a complete ring round the top. The tribe comprises about 250 species of herbs, trees, and shrubs, comprised under a few genera, inhabiting the warm and temperate regions of both hemispheres. It includes Heliotropium as the type, and related genera.

heliotropion, n. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + τροπή, a turning.] The plant heliotrope, the turnsol.

Apollo's heliotropion then shall stoop, And Venus' hyacinth shall veil her top.

Greene, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

heliotropism (hē-li-ō-trōp'izm), n. [As heliotrop-y + -ism.] In bot., the tendency of growing organs to bend toward or in some cases away from the light, due in the former case to the retarding influence exerted by the light upon their growth on the side of the highest illumination. Thus the stems of plants that are grown in a window, or under other conditions in which light falls laterally upon them, curve toward the light; and if their position is reversed, they soon turn again toward the side of greatest illumination. The leaves arrange themselves so that the rays of light fall as nearly as possible perpendicularly upon their upper surfaces, and the stem curves so as to direct its apex toward the source of light. Organs which behave in this way are said to be affected by positive heliotropism or to be simply heliotropic. On the other hand, certain organs upon which light also falls laterally curve in an opposite direction—that is, the apex is turned away from the source of light. Organs exhibiting this kind of curvature are said to be negatively heliotropic or apheliotropic. This condition is most fre-

Sun-bird or Sun-grebe (Heliothis fulica).

fulica. Bonnat, 1790. Podas (Illiger, 1811) is the same. (b) A genus of birds, of the family Eurypygidae; the sun-bitterns. Also called Helias. J. F. Voie, 1826.—2. In entom., a genus of lepidopterous insects. Dalman, 1820.

Heliothis (hē'li-ō'this), n. [NL., < Heliothis (-ornith-) + -idae.] A family of birds of uncertain position, typified by the genus Heliothis; the sun-birds, sun-grebes, coot-grebes, or finfoots. They are characterized by pinniped or lobate feet like those of grebes or coots, a fan-shaped tail of 18 feathers, plumage not after-shed, and a long slim neck with a small head.

helioscope (hē'li-ō-skōp), n. [Gr. ἥλιος, the sun, + σκοπεῖν, to look at.] A form of telescope fitted for viewing the sun without pain or injury to the eyes, as an instrument with colored glasses or quently observed in roots. A still further condition, which has been called transverse heliotropism by Frank and di-heliotropism by Darwin, is the condition under which certain organs tend to place their long axes perpendicular to the direction of the incident rays. The precise action of light in producing these various modifications is not well understood, but, as the studies of Vines have shown, it is probably largely due to modifications of the turgescence of the growing cells. Also heliotropy.

Heliotropism (hē'li-ō-trō-pi-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡλιότροπος, heliotropos: see heliotrope.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Boraginaceae and tribe Heliotropieae. It is distinguished by the form of its corolla, which is that of a salver or funnel and generally small, and its dry fruit, which commonly separates into 4 nutlets. The genus includes about 170 species of herbs and shrubs, with white or lilac flowers, inhabiting the warmer and temperate regions of both hemispheres. H. indicum, a native of nearly all tropical countries, is called wild clary in the West Indies. H. Peruvianum is the common heliotrope of gardens. See heliotrope.

heliotropy (hē'li-ō-trō-pi), n. [< Gr. ἡλιος, the sun, + τροπή, a turning. Cf. heliotrope.] Same as heliotropism.

heliotype (hē'li-ō-tīp), n. and a. [< Gr. ἡλιος, the sun, + τύπος, impression: see type.] I. n. A picture or print produced by the process of heliotyping; also, the process itself.

II. a. Of or pertaining to heliotyping or its processes or result. Also heliotypic.—Heliotype process. See heliotyping.

heliotyping (hē'li-ō-tīp), v.; pret. and pp. heliotyped, pp. heliotyping. [< heliotype, n.] I. trans. To produce a heliotype picture of.

II. intrans. To practise heliotyping; produce a picture by direct impression in printing-ink. heliotypic (hē'li-ō-tīp'ik), a. [As heliotype + -ic.] Same as heliotypic.

heliotyping (hē'li-ō-tīp), n. [As heliotype + -y.] A photographic process in which from an ordinary negative is made a positive of such character that from it a direct impression in ink can be obtained by means of a printing-press. In the Edwards process, as practised in the United States, a film of gelatin sensitized with bichromate of potash, and having chrome alum incorporated with it, is formed on glass, stripped off when dry, and exposed to light during a certain time under the negative. The film is then washed to remove the sensitive principle, and is attached to a plate of metal or other solid back. Those parts of the film which have been affected by the light during exposure under the negative are left in such condition that they can be made to take printing-ink, while the parts not affected, owing to the opacity of the corresponding parts of the negative, resist the ink. This process depends upon the fact that a gelatin film sensitized with bichromate of potash becomes by the action of light insoluble in water, while the parts which have been shielded from the light, and from which the potash has been eliminated after the exposure, swell when moistened. The films are technically called skins. In other processes a mold of gutta-percha or other material is prepared from the film, and copper is deposited on this by electrolysis. The resulting plate can be printed on an ordinary printing-press. See photogravure and photo-engraving.

Heliozoa (hē'li-ō-zō'jē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἡλιος, the sun, + ζῷον, an animal.] A name proposed by Hertwig and Lesser for the sun-animalcules, fresh-water organisms provided with radiolarian skeletons, and grouped by Huxley with the marine Radiolaria. Some divide them into three families, Actinophrydeae, Acanthocystidae, and Clathrulinidae. See Radiolaria.

heliozoan (hē'li-ō-zō'an), a. and n. [< Heliozoa + -an.] I. a. Having the character of a sun-animalcule; pertaining to the Heliozoa.

II. n. A sun-animalcule; one of the Heliozoa. heliozoic (hē'li-ō-zō'ik), a. [< Heliozoa + -ic.] Same as heliozoan.

So does the Heliozoic type seem to culminate in the marine Radiolaria. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 499.

Helisee, n. [ME., < OF. Helisee, prop. Elisee, Elysium: see Elysium.] Elysium.

It passed joy of Helisee the field. Court of Love, l. 119.

heli-spheric, heli-spherical (hel-i-sfer'ik, -i-kal), a. [For helioc-spheric*, helic-spherical*; < Gr. ἡλικός (hēlikos), a spiral, + σφαῖρα, sphere: see helix and spheric.] Spiral.—Heli-spherical line. Same as loxodromic curve (which see under loxodromic).

helium (hē'li-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλιος, the sun: see heliac.] A gaseous element having a density of 2.13 and an atomic weight of about 4.26. It was first identified by Frankland and Lockyer as present in the solar corona, its characteristic yellow line (D₃) having been noted in spectroscopic observation during an eclipse. The nature of the substance remained in doubt for nearly thirty years, until 1895, when Ramsay proved it to be also a terrestrial element, present in uraninite and some other allied minerals, in which it is associated with argon and nitrogen. It has also been obtained from meteoric iron and from the gases yielded by the water of certain springs, but has not been identified in the terrestrial atmosphere. It is believed to be monatomic. Attempts to liquefy it have been unsuccessful, and its boiling-point is inferred to be below that of hydrogen.

helix (hē'lik-s), n.; pl. helices, helices (hē'lik-sēz, hel'i-sēz). [< L. helix, a kind of ivy, a kind of willow, a volute in arch., < Gr. ἑλῖξ (ēlik-), anything which assumes a spiral shape, as a tendril, lock or curl of hair, etc., as adj. ἑλῖξ, twisted, curved, < ἐλίσσιν, turn round, akin to L. volvere, roll, and to E. wallow: see volute, involve, evolve, etc., and wallow.] 1. A spiral line, as of wire in a coil; a winding, or something that is spiral; a circumvolution; specifically, in geom., the curve assumed by a right line drawn on a plane when that plane is wrapped round a cylindrical surface of any kind, especially a right cylinder, as the curve of a screw-thread; also, a curve on any developable surface which becomes a right line when the surface is developed into a plane, as a conical helix.—2. In arch., any spiral, particularly a small volute or twist under the abacus of the Corinthian capital; also, a volute of the Ionic capital. In every Corinthian capital of the fully developed type there are sixteen helices, two at each angle, and two meeting under the middle of each face of the abacus, branching out of the cauliculi or secondary stalks which rise from between the leaves. 3. In elect., a coil of wire, as that surrounding the core of an electromagnet.—4. In anat.: (a) The prominent curved fold which forms most of the rim or margin of the outer ear. See second cut under ear¹. (b) The cochlea of the inner ear.—*5. [cap.] [NL.] In conch., the representative genus of Helicidae and Helicinae. Widely different limits have been assigned to it, and more than 4,000 species have been referred to it, varying greatly in size, shape, and color. Typical species are the common garden-snail of Europe, H. hortensis, and the Roman snail, H. pomatia. By many recent authors the genus is more or less restricted to such as are related to these species, or to one or the other of them. See cuts under Gasteropoda and Pulmonata.—Fossa of the helix. See fossa.—Osculating helix of a non-plane curve, the common helix which passes through three consecutive points and has its axis parallel to the rectifying line of the curve.*

hell (hel), n. [In the 17th century also hel; early mod. E. helle, < ME. helle, < AS. hell, hel (fem., gen. dat. acc. helle), the abode of the dead (Gr. ᾗδης, Hades, L. infernum), also the place of punishment for the wicked after death (LL. ML. infernum) = OS. hellia, hell, hel = OFries. hille, helle = D. hel = MLG. helle = OHG. hellia, hella, MHG. helle, G. helle (Luther), now irreg. hölle = Goth. hailja, hell (as in AS.). cf. Dan. helvede, Sw. helvete, OSw. helvite, hell, = AS. hellewite, hell's torment; = Icel. hel, the abode of the dead, Hades, also death, and personified, Hel, the ogress Hel, the Proserpine of Scand. mythology. The personification does not appear in Goth., AS., OHG., etc., though prob. once existent. Prob. orig. the 'hidden' or 'unseen' place (or goddess) (cf. Hades, similarly explained as 'unseen'), < AS. helan, ME. helen, E. *heal*² (= OHG. helan, etc.), cover, conceal, hide: see *heal*². Cf. *heal*².] *1. The abode of the dead; the place of departed spirits; the grave; the infernal regions, regarded as a place of existence after death: called in Hebrew Sheol, and by the Greeks Hades.*

Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Ps. xvi. 10.

He descended again into Hell, that is, into the Grave, to fetch his Body, and to rise again. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 53.

[In the authorized version of the Bible the word hell occurs 54 times, viz., 31 times in the Old Testament and 23 times in the New. In the Old Testament it translates the Hebrew name Sheol, which is also translated the grave (31 times) and the pit (3 times). In the revised version hell has been retained in the prophetic books, and Sheol substituted for it in the poetical books and passages, except in Deut. xxxii. 22, Ps. lv. 15, and lxxvi. 13, where it is changed to pit. In both the authorized and the revised version of the New Testament, hell is used 12 times to translate the Greek γέεννα (transliterated gehenna in the Vulgate), while in the authorized version it is used 10 times for the Greek ᾗδης, and once (2 Pet. ii. 4) for ταρταρώσας (Tartarus). In the revised version hell is retained for Tartarus, and Hades has been used for the Greek ᾗδης. See Gehenna, græve, Hades, and Sheol.] 2. The abode of devils and condemned spirits; the place or state of punishment of the wicked after death; the infernal regions, regarded as a place of torment.

Bi-seke we nu Godes migt, That he make ure sowles brigt, And shilde us fro elles nigt, And lede us to blisse and in-to ligt. Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), l. 4157.

And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Mat. x. 28.

Be thou a spirit of health, or goblin damn'd, Bring with thee airs from heaven, or blasts from hell. Shak., Hamlet, l. 4.

Hail, horrors; hail, Infernal world! and thou, profoundest hell, Receive thy new possessor. Milton, P. L., l. 251.

3. The infernal powers; the powers of darkness and evil.

Richard yet lives, hell's black intelligencer, Only reserv'd their factor, to buy souls, And send them thither. Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4.

4. Something regarded as resembling hell.

The hell of waters! where they howl and hiss, And boil in endless torture. Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 69.

Specifically—(a) Any place or condition of captivity or torment; any experience of great suffering: as, a hell upon earth; a hell of suspense or suspicion.

The mind is its own place, and in itself Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven. Milton, P. L., l. 255.

But quiet to quick bosoms is a hell, And there hath been thy bane. Byron, Childe Harold, iii. 42.

(b) A gaming-house; a gaming-room; a gamblers' den.

Don Juan, our young diplomatic sinner, Pursued his path, and drove past some hotels, St. James's Palace and St. James's Hells. Byron, Don Juan, xi. 29.

At midnight he had lost forty-eight thousand pounds. . . . The atmosphere was hot, to be sure, but it will be come such a hell. Disraeli, Young Duke, iv. 8.

(c) In some games, as barley-brake, the place to which those who are caught are carried.

Then couples three be straight allotted there, They of both ends the middle two do fly; The two that, in mid-place, Hell called were, Must strive, with waiting foot and watching eye, To catch of them, and then to Hell to bear. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, i.

(d) A place where things are covered up or hidden; a place of concealment; specifically, a place into which a tailor throws his shreds or his cabbage stuff, or a printer his broken type.

Secreta. [It.] . . . The name of a place in Venice where all their secret records and ancient evidences be kept, as hell is in Westminster Hall. Florio, 1598.

Lawyers and tailors have their several hells. Beau. and Fl. (C), Faithful Friends, i. 2.

All know the cellarage under the shop-board He calls his hell. Middleton and Rowley, World Tost at Tennis.

(et) Formerly, in England, a place under the exchequer chamber where the king's debtors were confined. Raibald and Lawrence.—To lead apes in hell. See ape.

hell², v. t. [A var. of *hill*², or ult. of *heal*², *hele*², hide: see *hill*², *heal*².] To hide; cover.

Else would the waters overflow the lands, And fire devour the ayre, and hell them quight. Spenser, F. Q., iv. x. 35.

hell, a. A colloquial contraction of he will.

Helladian (he-lā'di-an), a. [< Gr. ἑλλάς (ēllās), Hellas, Greece, + -ian.] Same as Hellenic. [Rare.]

Helladic (he-lad'ik), a. [< Gr. ἑλλάς (ēllās), Hellas, Greece, + -ic.] Same as Hellenic. [Rare.]

Zeuxis, Parrhasius and their followers, under the general name of the Asiatic school, were opposed to the Grecian (Helladic) school. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 139.

helladothere (hel'ā-dō-thēr), n. [< Helladothereum.] The animal upon whose remains the genus Helladothereum was founded.

Helladotheriidae (hel'ā-dō-thē-ri'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Helladothereum + -idae.] The family of ruminants in which the genus Helladothereum represents.

Helladotherioidea (hel'ā-dō-thē-ri-o'i-dē-jē), n. pl. [NL., < Helladothereum + -oidea.] The Helladotheriidae rated as a superfamily. Gill.

Helladotherium (hel'ā-dō-thē-ri-um), n. [< Gr. ἑλλάς (ēllās), Hellas, Greece, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil ruminant mammals of uncertain affinities, by some referred to the Giraffidae, by others made the type of a family Helladotheriidae. The remains occur in the Upper Miocene and Pliocene of Greece (whence the name) and elsewhere. Gaudry, 1860.

Hellandic (hel-a-nod'ik), n. [< Gr. ἑλλανόδικα, Doric form of ἑλλανόδικα*, pl., < ἑλλανες, Doric ἑλλανες, sing. ἑλλαν, a Greek (see Helene), + δίκη, judgment.] In Gr. antiq., one of the judges at the Olympic games, who awarded the prizes.

hell-bale, n. [ME. hellebale, prop. two words: helle, gen. of hell, and *bale*¹.] The torment of hell.

God shield his soul from hell-bale,
Who made it thus in English tale.
Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), Pref., p. xiv.

hellbender (hel'ben'dér), n. [*< hell*¹, 2, as a term of emphasis, + bender, 4.] 1. A protracted and reckless debauch or drunken frolic. See bender, 4. [Slang, U. S.]—2. The menopome, Menopoma alleghaniensis (or Protonops

Hellbender (Menopoma alleghaniensis).

horrida), a large aquatic salamander with gill-slits and short legs, common in the Ohio valley; one of several such creatures known as mud-puppies and water-dogs. See Menopoma.

hell-bent (hel'bent'), a. Recklessly determined, without regard to consequences; determined to have or do at all hazards; resolved; "dead-set": as, he went hell-bent after it. [Slang, U. S.]

Maine went Hell-bent
For Governor Kent.

Political song (1840).

hell-black (hel'blak), a. Black or dark as hell.

The sea, with such a storm as his bare head
In hell-black night endur'd, would have buoy'd up,
And quench'd the stelled fires. Shak., Lear, iii. 7.

hell-born (hel'börn), a. Born of or in hell; of hellish origin.

Retire, or taste thy folly; and learn by proof,
Hell-born, not to contend with spirits of heaven!
Milton, P. L., ii. 687.

hell-broth (hel'bróth), n. A composition supposed to be of magical quality prepared for malignant purposes.

Like a hell-broth boil and bubble.
Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1.

hell-cat (hel'kat), n. A witch; a hag; a furious vixen.

"Vat voman?" "A hell-cat, who hates me as she does the devil."
Marryat, Snarleygown, II. i.

hell-diver (hel'dí'vér), n. A grebe. [U. S.] hell-doomed (hel'dómd), a. Doomed or consigned to hell.

And reckon'st thou thyself with spirits of heaven, Hell-doomed? Milton, P. L., ii. 697.

hell-driver (hel'drí'vèr), n. The dobsen or hellgrammite. [Raleigh, North Carolina, U. S.]

Helleboraceæ (hel'e-bō-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Helleborus + -aceæ.] The name proposed by Spach for the tribe of plants Helleboreæ.

helleboraceus (hel'e-bō-rā'shius), a. [< hellebore + -aceus. Cf. Helleboraceæ.] Related to or resembling hellebore; belonging to the Helleboraceæ. [Little used.]

helleboraster (hel'e-bō-ras'tèr), n. [< hellebore + -aster.] The fetid hellebore, Helleborus fetidus.

hellebore (hel'e-bōr), n. [Formerly also elebore; *< ME. elebore, elebur, < OF. elebore, F. élébore, hellebore = Sp. eléboro, elebor = Pg. helleboro = It. eléboro, < L. helleborus, eleborus, also helleborum, eleborum, < Gr. ἑλλέβορος, rarely ἑλλέβορον, hellebore (L. veratrum); ulterior origin unknown.] 1. A plant of the genus Helleborus, of the natural order Ranunculaceæ, particularly H. niger, the black hellebore or Christmas rose, a native of southwestern Europe. It is a drastic hydragogue cathartic, possessing emmenagogue powers, in overdoes producing inflammation of the gastric and intestinal mucous membrane, with violent vomiting, vertigo, cramp, and convulsions, which sometimes end in death. H. viridis, the green hellebore, a native of Europe, is naturalized in the United States. The fetid or stinking hellebore is H. fetidus, a name also given to the skunk-cabbage, Symplocarpus foetidus.*

It scheweth sumtyme yn medicyns maad of elebore, there is no thing that puttith away the crampaes as doith our 5 essence. Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 22.

Here mercury, here hellebore,
Old ulcers mundifying.

Drayton, Muses' Elysium, v.

2. A name of similar plants of other genera. Erantia hiemalis, a plant closely allied to Helleborus, is called winter hellebore. Veratrum viride, a lilaceous plant, is known as American, false, or white hellebore, swamp-hellebore, and Indian poke.

3. The powdered root of American hellebore, used to destroy lice and caterpillars.

Helleborææ (hel'e-bō'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1818), < Helleborus + -ææ.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Ranunculaceæ, distinguished by the petaloid sepals, petals mostly small or wanting, and the several-ovuled carpels, which are dehiscent at maturity, or rarely baccate. The tribe embraces about 130 species of annual or perennial herbs, included under about 20 genera, with leaves which are radical, alternate, or resembling an involucre. Here belong, besides the hellebore, the goldenseal, Hydrastis Canadensis, whose rhizomes are used in medicine, and the common columbine, Aquilegia vulgaris. See cut under *columbine*².

helleborin (hel'e-bō-rin), n. [< hellebore + *-in*².] A crystalline glucoside having poisonous properties, found in black hellebore.

helleborine (hel'e-bō-rin), n. [= F. élébore = Sp. eleborina = Pg. helleborinha, < L. helleborine, elleborine, < Gr. ἑλλέβοριν, a plant like hellebore, < ἑλλέβορος, hellebore: see hellebore.] 1. A plant of the genus Epipactis, natural order Orchidææ. There are but few species, perennials with creeping rhizomes, fibrous roots, leafy stems, and loose racemes of dull-colored flowers. They are natives of the northern hemisphere, three or four species being found in Great Britain.

2. A European orchidaceous plant, Cephalanthera rubra.

helleborise, v. t. See helleborize.

helleborism (hel'e-bō-rizm), n. [= F. élébore = L. helleborismus, Gr. ἑλλέβορισμός, a dosing with hellebore, < ἑλλέβορίζω, dose with hellebore: see helleborize.] The ancient practice of treating disease (insanity) with hellebore.

When he offered his public thesis, on the Helleborism of the Ancients. J. B. Wood, Address on Hahnemann, p. 5.

helleborize (hel'e-bō-riz), v. t.; pret. and pp. helleborized, pp. helleborizing. [= F. élébore = L. helleboris, < Gr. ἑλλέβορίζω, dose with hellebore, < ἑλλέβορος, hellebore: see hellebore.] To dose with hellebore, as in dementia; treat for madness with hellebore. Also spelled helleborise.

I am represented . . . as singular in the paradox, nay, as one who would be helleborised as a madman for harbouring the absurdity. Sir W. Hamilton.

Helleborus (he-leb'ō-rus), n. [NL., < L. helleborus, also eleborus, < Gr. ἑλλέβορος, hellebore: see hellebore.] A genus of plants belonging to the tribe Helleboreæ, of the natural order Ranunculaceæ. The plants are distinguished by the 5 regular sepals, small petals, and many carpels, which are many-seeded. The genus, known under the general name hellebore, includes about 11 species of erect perennial herbs, with deeply cut leaves and large white, yellowish, or greenish flowers, natives of Europe and western Asia. A well-known species is the Christmas rose, or black hellebore, H. niger, common in gardens; it is a native of Europe, and its rootstock is used in medicine. See hellebore.

hellejay, n. See hellyay.

Hellene (hel'ēn), n. [= F. Hellène, < Gr. Ἑλληνες, pl. form, in Homer (if the single instance is genuine), a Thessalian tribe of which Ἑλλήν (Hellen) was the reputed chief; later (earliest record 586 B. C.) a general name for all the Greeks; in N. T. and eccl. writers used for 'Gentiles'; rarely in sing. Ἑλλην, a Greek. The origin of the name is unknown; Hellen is no doubt an eponym.] 1. An ancient Greek; properly, a Greek of pure race: traditionally said to be so called from Hellen, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, the legendary ancestor of the true Greeks, consisting of the Dorians, Æolians, Ionians, and Achæans.

From the nature of the country inhabited by the Hellenes, Buckle infers the symmetry of the Hellenic mind. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 262.

2. A subject of the modern kingdom of Greece, or Hellas.

Hellenian (he-lē'ni-an), a. Same as Hellenic.

Hellenic (he-len'ik), a. [= F. hellénique, < Gr. Ἑλληνικός, < Ἑλλήνες, the Greeks: see Hellene.] Pertaining to the Hellenes or Greeks; displaying qualities or tendencies characteristic of the Greek race, historically considered (compare Hellenism, 2); Greek; Grecian.

Into the Reformation too . . . the subtle Hellenic leaven of the Renaissance found its way.

M. Arnold, Hebraism and Hellenism.

A glance at the position of Cyprus on the map explains why it never became truly Hellenic.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 819.

Perhaps there is no other instance of so instinctive a yearning towards the old Hellenic life as is to be seen in Keats.

J. C. Shairp, Aspects of Poetry, p. 150.

In art, applied specifically to Greek work from the close of the primitive epoch to the Roman supremacy in Greece, beginning 146 B. C., or, more narrowly, until the time of Alexander the Great and the sculptor Lysippus, about 330 B. C., the adjective Hellenist being applied to subsequent work. The Hellenic epoch includes the period of Hellenic Art.

the development and perfection of the Doric and Ionic orders, and that during which the principles of the Corinthian order were worked out. In sculpture, etc., this period comprises the works of the grand style, which succeeded the archaic. See Greek art, under Greek.—Hellenic dialect. See common dialect, under common.

Hellenically (he-len'i-kal-i), adv. In the Hellenic manner; according to the standards of Hellenism.

Hellenicism (he-len'i-sizm), n. [< Hellenic + -ism.] Hellenic character or quality; Hellenic style.

He is drawn on to study in detail the Hellenicism, the refinement of knowledge and taste, the subtle convolutions of grace, with which the painter illustrates the poet. Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 37.

Hellenisation, Hellenise. See Hellenization, Hellenize.

Hellenism (hel'en-izm), n. [= F. hellénisme = Sp. helenismo = Pg. hellenismo = It. ellenismo, < Gr. Ἑλληνισμός, imitation of the Greeks, use of a pure Greek style and idiom, < ἑλληνίζω, speak Greek, make Greek: see Hellenize.] 1. A peculiarity of the Greek language; a word, phrase, idiom, or construction used or formed in the Greek manner.

Virgil is full of the Greek Forms of Speech, which the Critics call Hellenisms. Addison, Spectator, No. 285.

We find examples of Latinisms in Byzantine Greek, and of Hellenisms in the decay of classic Latin.

G. P. Marsh, Hist. Eng. Lang., p. 249.

2. The spirit and tendency regarded as especially characteristic of the Greek race, historically considered, and as best exemplified in its pursuit of intellectual and physical culture, and its predilection for the noble, the strong, and the beautiful in thought and action. See extract under Hebraism, 2.

To get rid of one's ignorance, to see things as they are, and by seeing them as they are to see them in their beauty, is the simple and attractive ideal which Hellenism holds out before human nature; and from the simplicity and charm of this ideal, Hellenism, and human life in the hands of Hellenism, . . . are full of what we call sweetness and light. . . . As the great movement of Christianity was a triumph of Hebraism and man's moral impulses, so the great movement which goes by the name of the Renaissance was an uprising and re-instatement of man's intellectual impulses and Hellenism.

M. Arnold, Culture and Anarchy, iv.

3. Conformity to Greek speech and ideas; imitation or adoption of Greek characteristics in any respect.

Hellenism [among the Jews] served as the preparation for a catholic creed. As it furnished the language of Christianity, it supplied also that literary instinct which counteracted the traditional reserve of the Palestinian Jews. McClintock and Strong's Encyclopedia, IV. 176.

Hellenist (hel'en-ist), n. [= F. helléniste = Sp. helenista = Pg. hellenista = It. ellenista, < Gr. ἑλληνιστής, in N. T. one who uses the Greek language, later eccl. sometimes for 'Gentile,' < ἑλληνίζω, speak Greek, make Greek: see Hellenize. 1. One who is partly Greek; one who has Greek affinities, or who adopts the Greek language, manners, and customs; specifically, a Jew who used the Greek language and conformed more or less to Greek influence in the early period of Christianity, both in Palestine and in foreign countries, especially Egypt.

These Jews understood Greek, and used the Greek Bible, and therefore are called Hellenists.

Hammond, On Acts vi. 1.

Luke, the physician and Hellenist.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 32.

2. One skilled in the Greek language and literature; a Greek scholar; a Grecian.

Richard Bentley, the Master of Trinity College, and the greatest Hellenist of his age.

W. Mathews, Getting on in the World, p. 250.

3. A promoter of Greek culture; specifically, one of the learned Greeks who, after the fall of Constantinople in 1453, disseminated the knowledge of the Greek language and literature in Italy, and were among the chief agents of the revival of learning.

Hellenistic (hel-e-nis'tik), a. [Hellenist + -ic.] 1. Resembling or partaking of Hellenic character, but not truly Hellenic; combining Greek and foreign characteristics or elements, as many of the later Greeks and the Hellenized neighboring peoples, or the modified Greek language, thought, etc., current among them.

The civilization resulting from these political changes [after the time of Alexander] showed a decline from the pure Greek or Hellenic model, and is called Hellenistic.

The Century, XXV. 87, note.

The religious conceptions and philosophy of the Hellenistic Jews.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 173.

2. Particularly, in sculpture and painting, characteristic of the school of Greek art based on the art of Lysippus, the court sculptor of Alexander the Great, which may or may not be considered to include the work of Lysippus himself. It lasted from about 330 B. C. until the Roman supremacy in Greece, and may be extended to include all the work done for the Romans by Greek artists, or in the Greek manner and following Greek models, as late as the early empire. Hellenistic art is characterized in general by a research of effect (posing), by a decided leaning toward the colossal, and by great skill and cleverness in design and execution; but it lacks originality, and seeks to copy the types and methods of the Hellenic epoch rather than to find inspiration in original conceptions and contemporary aims.—Hellenistic dialect, a local dialect of ancient Greek in the period after Alexander the Great, spoken by a population not Greek in origin; especially, the dialect used by Greek-speaking Jews, and called also the Alexandrine dialect, found in the Septuagint, and in a less marked form in the New Testament: opposed to the common or Hellenic dialect.

The formation of a Hellenistic dialect, largely intermixed with Semitic idioms. J. Hadley, Essays, p. 413.

Hellenistical (hel-e-nis'ti-kal), a. [Hellenistic + -al.] Same as Hellenistic.

Into the importance of the Hellenistical dialect he had made the exactest search.

Bp. Fell, Hammond, § 1.

Hellenistically (hel-e-nis'ti-kal-i), adv. In the Hellenistic manner.

It may bear the same signification hellenistically in this place.

J. Gregory, Notes on Passages in Scripture, p. 60.

Hellenization (hel'en-i-zā'shon), n. [Hellenize + -ation.] The act of Hellenizing, or the state of being imbued with Greek ideas or methods. Also spelled Hellenisation.

The establishment and gradual Hellenization of Christianity as a system of doctrine.

Hellenize (hel'en-iz), v.; pret. and pp. Hellenized, ppr. Hellenizing. [Gr. ἑλληνίζω, speak Greek, tr. make Greek, < ἑλλην, the Greeks, ἑλλω, a Greek: see Hellene.] 1. trans. To make Hellenic or Hellenistic; cause to conform to Greek standards in any particular.

The only strange god to be seen is Ammon, who had been long Hellenized already.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 145.

It is still a question whether the Macedonians should be regarded as barbarized Hellenes, or Hellenized barbarians; a coalition of both elements may be inferred from their earliest traditions.

Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 368.

The Greeks . . . endeavored to strengthen their position by Hellenizing . . . the Bulgarian population of Turkey from the source of the Greek Church.

J. Baker, Turkey, p. 73.

II. intrans. 1. To conform to Greek standards or usages.—2. To use the Greek language. [Rare.]—3. To exhibit a tendency to Hellenism; cultivate Hellenism as an ideal of thinking and conduct. See Hellenism, 2.

The development of our Hellenizing instincts, seeking ardently the intelligible law of things, and making a stream of fresh thought play freely about our stock notions and habits, is what is most wanted by us at present.

M. Arnold, Culture and Anarchy, v.

Also spelled Hellenise.

Hellenizer (hel'en-i-zēr), n. One who makes Hellenic; one who or that which exerts a Hellenic or Hellenizing influence.

hellenotype (hel-len'o-tip), n. A picture composed of two finished photographs, of which one is very light, made translucent by means of varnish, tinted on the back, and placed over the second and stronger print, thus producing a combination of effects. Also called hallo-type. Silver Sunbeam.

heller (hel'ēr), n. [Gr. also hällar, haller (NL. hällensis), < Hall, a town in Swabia, where the coin was originally issued.] A small coin formerly current in Germany, struck in silver and in copper, and worth about a farthing.

Helmet-quail (Lophortyx californicus).

quail of California, and L. gambeli, which abounds in Arizona. Both are favorite game-birds, occupying the same place that is filled by the bob-white in eastern parts of the United States. Coues.

helmet-shaped (hel'met-shāpt), a. Shaped like a helmet; in bot., galeate.

helmet-shell (hel'met-shel), n. The shell of a mollusk of the genus Cassia; a cameo-shell. Most of them are found in tropical seas, some in the Mediterranean. They are numerous, some attaining a large size. Such species as C. rufa, C. cornuta, and C. tuberosa furnish the material upon which shell-cameos are engraved. See cut under Cassididae.

helm-guard (helm'gārd), n. In armor, a chain attaching the helm to the girdle or to the mammelière. See guard-chain.

helm-hoort, n. A helmet. Halliwell.

helminth (hel'minth), n. [< Gr. ἔλμινθ (ἐλμινθ-), also ἔλμιν, a worm, particularly a maw-worm, intestinal worm, allied to ἔλμιν, a helix: see helix.] A worm; especially, an entozoan, entoparasitic, or intestinal worm, as a cestoid, trematode, or nematode. See cut under Cestoidea.

helminthagogic (hel-min-tha-goj'ik), a. [< helminthagog-ue + -ic.] Having the properties of a helminthagogue or vermifuge; anthelmintic; vermifugal.

helminthagogue (hel-min-tha-gog), n. [< Gr. ἔλμινθ (ἐλμινθ-), a worm, + ἀγωγός, leading, driving, < ἀγω, lead, drive.] In med., a remedy against worms; an anthelmintic; a vermifuge.

Helmintherus (hel-min-thé'rus), n. [NL. (orig. erroneously Helmithus), < Gr. ἔλμινθ (ἐλμινθ-), a worm, + irreg. θήρ, hunt, < θήρ, a wild beast.] A genus of worm-eating warblers, the type of which is H. vermivorus, a common bird of the eastern United States, about 5½ inches long, of an olive-green color above, and having the head striped with a tawny color and with black. Coues, 1882.

Helminthes (hel-min-théz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἔλμινθ, pl. ἔλμινθες, a worm: see helminth.] A large group of worms. The term is not now in technical use, but corresponds in a general way to Cestoidea, Trematoidea, and Nematodea.

Helminthia (hel-min-thi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἔλμινθ (ἐλμινθ-), a worm.] See Picris.

helminthiasis (hel-min-thi-ä-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἔλμινθ, suffer from worms, < ἔλμινθ (ἐλμινθ-), a worm.] In pathol., a condition characterized by the presence of worms in any part of the body.

helminthic (hel-min'thik), a. and n. [< helminth + -ic.] I. a. 1. In zool., pertaining to helminths or worms.—2. In med., expelling worms; vermifugal.

II. n. A medicine for expelling worms; a vermifuge.

helminthomorphous (hel-min-thi-môr'fus), a. [< Gr. ἑλμινθός (ēlminthós), a worm, + μορφή (morfē), form.] In entom., helminthoid: specifically applied to certain dipterous larvae which resemble worms and live in the bodies of vertebrates.

Helminthocladia (hel-min-thō-klā'di-ä), n. [< Gr. ἑλμινθός (ēlminthós), a worm, + κλάδος (kládōs), a branch.] A small genus of red algae, the type of the order Helminthocladiales of Agardh. The fronds are terete, much branched and decomposed laterally, and more or less gelatinous.

helminthoid (hel-min'thoid), a. [*< Gr. ἑλμινθόειδης (ēlminthóeidēs), contr. ἑλμινθώδης (ēlminthōdēs), like a worm, + εἶδος (eîdos), form.] Resembling a helminth; worm-like in form; vermiform.

helmintholite (hel-min'thō-lit), n. [< helmintholite.] A fossil of the genus Helmintholite.

Helmintholithus (hel-min-thol'it-i-thus), n. [< Gr. ἑλμινθός (ēlminthós), a worm, + λίθος (lithos), a stone.] A Linnean genus of fossils supposed to be helminthoid.

helminthologic (hel-min-thō-loj'ik), a. [< helminthology + -ic.] Pertaining to helminthology.

helminthological (hel-min-thō-loj'ik-al), a. [< helminthologic + -al.] Same as helminthologic.

The introduction of helminthological experiment by Küchenmeister. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 50.

helminthologist (hel-min-thol'ō-jist), n. [< helminthology + -ist.] One who is versed in helminthology.

helminthology (hel-min-thol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. ἑλμινθός (ēlminthós), a worm, + λογία (logia), < λέγειν (legein), speak; see -ology.] The science of worms, especially of parasitic worms.

Helminthophaga (hel-min-thof'a-gä), n. [< Gr. ἑλμινθός (ēlminthós), a worm, + φάγειν (phagein), eat.] A large and beautiful genus of American warblers, of the family Mniotiltidae, characterized by a very acute unnotched bill; the worm-eating warblers. They are small, usually gaily colored, and very pretty migratory birds of woodlands, especially of the eastern United States, such as the blue-winged yellow warbler, H. pinus; the golden-winged warbler, H. chrysoptera; the orange-crowned warbler, H. celata; the Tennessee warbler, H. peregrina; the Nashville warbler, H. rupestris; Bachman's warbler, H. bachmani; Lucy's warbler, H. luciae; Virginia's warbler, H. virginica. This genus was founded in ornithology by Cabanis in 1850; but the name, being preoccupied in a different connection, has lately been changed to Helminthophila.

Helminthosporium (hel-min-thō-spō'ri-um), n. [< Gr. ἑλμινθός (ēlminthós), a worm, + σπόρος (spōros), seed, spore.] A genus of hyphomycetous fungi, having simple or slightly branched irregular flocci and multiseptate spores.

helminthosporoid (hel-min-thō-spō'roid), a. [< Helminthosporium + -oid.] Having the structure or appearance of the genus Helminthosporium.

harmless (harm'less), a. [< harm + -less.] Having no harm or steering-apparatus.

Your National Assembly, like a ship water-logged, harmless, lies tumbling. Carlyle, French Rev., II. vi. 5.

I sit within a harmless bark. Tennyson, In Memoriam, iv.

harmless (harm'less), a. [< harm + -less.] Without a helm or helmet.

helm-port (helm'pört), n. Naut., the hole in the counter of a ship through which the rudder passes; the rudder-port.

helmsman (helmz'män), n.; pl. helmsmen (-men). Naut., the man at the helm or wheel, who steers a ship.

I find a magic bark;
I leap on board; no helmsman steers;
I float till all is dark. Tennyson, Sir Galahad.

Helobacterium (hē'lō-bak-tē'ri-um), n. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, + βακτήριον (baktērion), a little stick; see bacterium.] A name given by Cohn and others to certain rod-shaped bacteria presenting a club-shaped extremity, under the impression that they were specifically or generically distinct. Later investigation has shown that they are merely the fructifying stage of well-known forms.

Helobia (he-lō'bi-ä), n. pl. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a marsh, + βίος (bios), life.] An order of monocotyledonous plants, created by A. Braun in 1864, and still adhered to by Goebel and other botanists, but regarded by most as embracing several natural orders, such as the Lemnaceae, Alismaceae, Naiadaceae, and Hydrocharitaceae. In Sachs's classification it is expanded into a series embracing several orders and subordinate families.

helobious (he-lō'bi-us), a. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a marsh, + βίος (bios), life.] Living in swamps or marshes; palustrine.

helocerous (hē-lo's'e-rus), a. [< NL. helocerus, < Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, + κέρα (kēra), horn.] Having clavate antennae; clavicorn; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Clavicornia.

heloderm (hē-lō-dēr'm), n. [< Heloderma.] A lizard of the genus Heloderma, as the cactatepon and the Gila monster.

I was present when the heloderm bit two guinea-pigs in the hind leg. . . . The bites were viciously inflicted, and the lizard did not readily relinquish its hold.

Sir J. Fayer, Proc. Zool. Soc., 1882, p. 632.

Heloderma (hē-lō-dēr'mä), n. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, stud, ward, + δέρμα (dēрма), skin.] The only known genus of venomous lizards, typical of the family Helodermatidae, having the skin studded with tubercles like nail-heads, whence the name. There are two species, of large size and most repulsive aspect, H. horridum, the Mexican cactatepon, and H. suspectum, the Gila monster (which see, under monster).

Helodermatidae (hē'lō-dēr-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, stud, ward, + δέρμα (dēрма), skin.] An American family of venomous lizards, represented by the genus Heloderma. It includes esquamate-tongued lizards with clavicles not dilated proximally, a postorbital arch, no postfrontosuperciliary arch, the pre- and postfrontals in contact, separating the frontal from the orbit, and furrowed teeth receiving the efferent ducts of highly developed salivary glands. The Helodermatidae are the only Lacertilia known to be poisonous; the fact of their venomousness was established in 1882, but it had previously been suspected, whence the name H. suspectum of the Gila monster. See Gila monster (under monster) and heloderm. Also Helodermidae.

helodermatoid (hē-lō-dēr'mat-oid), a. [< Heloderma + -oid.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Helodermatidae.

helodermatous (hē-lō-dēr'mat-us), a. [< Heloderma + -ous.] Having a studded, warty, or tuberculous skin: specifically applied to the heloderms.

helodes (hē-lō'dēz), n. [< Gr. ἥλδης (hēldēs), of a marsh, marshy, < ἥλος (hēlos), marsh, + εἶδος (eîdos), form.] In pathol.: (a) Marsh-fever. (b) A kind of fever characterized by profuse perspiration.

helodont (hē-lō-dont), a. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, + ὀδών (odon) = E. tooth.] Shaped like a nail or spike, as a tooth; also, having such teeth.

A number of small helodont teeth are scattered over some of the pieces of limestone.

J. W. Davis, Geol. Mag., III. 151.

Helodus (hē'lō-dus), n. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, + ὀδών (odon) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil selachians, based upon teeth of apparently cetraclerion sharks which abound in Carboniferous limestone: so called from the studded appearance of their crushing crowns. L. Agassiz, 1838.

Helocetes (he-lō'se-tēz), n. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a marsh, + οἰκέτης (oikētēs), a house-slave, a menial, < οἶκος (oikos), inhabit, < οἶκος (oikos), a house.] A notable genus of aquatic tree-toads, of the family Hylidae. H. triacris is one of the common species of the United States, whose shrilling may be heard through the summer in swampy places. Also written Helocetes.

Helonæa (hel-ō-nē-ä), n. [< NL. (Audubon, 1839, as Helinaia; changed to Helonæa by A. New- ton), < Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a marsh.] A genus of American worm-eating warblers, of the family Mniotiltidae, having a peculiar bill resembling that of a meadow-lark. There is but one species, H. swainsoni, a near relative of the worm-eating warbler, Helminthosporium, inhabiting the Southern States. It was long regarded as one of the rarest of warblers, but has lately been found to abound in swamps in South Carolina.

Helonias (he-lō'ni-as), n. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a marsh.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, founded by Linnaeus in 1753, belonging to the natural order Liliaceae, tribe Narthecieae, with petioled radical leaves, those of the stem few and small, small flowers in dense racemes, the stamens little longer than the perianth, and three very short styles. Only one species is known, H. bullata, a botanical rarity of the United States, growing in wet places in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. It is a very handsome plant.

Helophilus (he-lō'f-i-lus), n. [< Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a marsh, + φίλος (phílos), loving.] 1. A genus of syrphid flies, founded by Meigen in 1822. They are large, nearly naked, black or brown with yellow spots or bands, and usually marked by light stripes on the back of the thorax. The larvae have no mouth-hooks, and probably live, like those of Eristalis, in manure and foul water. Twenty North American and about as many European species are described.

2. A genus of water-beetles, of the family Hydrophilidae, erected by Mulsant in 1844. It is synonymous with the extensive genus Philhydrus of Solier.

Helophoridae (hē-lō-for'i-dē), n. pl. [< NL. < Helophorus + -idae.] A family of aquatic palpicorn beetles, named from the genus Helophorus. See Hydrophilidae. Also written Helophoridae, Helophorites.

Helophorus (hē-lōf'ō-rus), n. [< NL. (Fabricius, 1776), < Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, stud, + φόρος (phōros), bearing, < φέρειν (pherein) = E. bear.] The typical genus of Helophoridae. There are many species, mainly European and North American, but also some Asiatic and North African. H. lineatus of Say is found in the United States.

helops (hē-lōps), n. [< L. helops, also elops, some sea-fish: see Elops.] Some sea-fish, a favorite with the Romans.

Salmons from Aquitaine, helops from Rhodes. Middleton, Game at Chess, v. 3.

Helops (hē-lōps), n. [< NL. < Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail, stud, + ὤψ (ōps), face (appearance).] A notable genus of tenebrionine beetles with slender tarsi, sessile abdomen, and a coriaceous band over the labrum. H. micans is a beautifully striped bronze species. Nearly 200 species are known, about 30 of them North American and the rest mainly European, though a few are found in Asia, North Africa, the Azores, Madeira, and Australia. Fabricius, 1775.

Helosidae (hē-lōs'i-dē), n. pl. [< Helosis + -idae.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Balanophoreae, made by Lindley in 1845 to include the genus Helosis and 4 other genera: nearly equivalent to the tribe Helosideae of Benth and Hooker.

Helosideae (hē-lōs'id-ē), n. pl. [< Helosis + -idae.] A tribe of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Balanophoreae, typified by Helosis. It is distinguished by its imperfect flowers, which are monocious or dioecious. The staminate flowers, with the stamens in a column, are furnished with a perianth, which in the pistillate flowers is adnate to the 2-styled ovary and has a 2-lipped limb. The tribe consists of fleshy herbs, destitute of chlorophyll, and parasitic on roots, with the small flowers crowded into a rounded or oblong head. There are 4 genera, natives of tropical America, India, and Java.

Helosia (hē-lōs'i-ä), n. pl. [< Helosis + -ia.] Same as Helosideae. Schott and Endlicher, 1832.

Helosis (hē-lō'sis), n. [< NL. (so called from the shape of the bracts, which are prominent before anthesis), < Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), a nail.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Balanophoreae and tribe Helosideae. It is characterized by a branched rootstock, bearing erect, naked scapes, and by a 3-lobed perianth of the staminate flowers with united stamens, that of the pistillate flowers being superior to the 1-celled ovary which in fruit becomes a nut. The genus comprises three, or according to some authors only one species of parasitic, smooth, dark-red herbs, natives of tropical America. They are supposed to possess sytyptic properties.

helosis (hē-lō'sis), n. [< NL., also written helosis, appar. intended as a formation from Gr. ἥλος (hēlos), turn round, roll up, akin to ἑλίσσιν, turn, ἑλίσ, helix, L. volvere, and E. wallow: see helix, volve, and wallow.] In pathol.: (a) Eversion of the eyelids. (b) Spasm of the eye-muscles. (c) Strabismus. (d) Plica polonica. See plica.

Helophilus latifrons, natural size.

Golden-winged Warbler (Helminthophaga chrysoptera).

Helostoma (hē-lo's-tō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥλος, a nail, + στόμα, the mouth.] The typical genus of Helostomidae, having a peculiar small mouth.

helostomid (hē-lo's-tō-mid), n. A fish of the family Helostomidae.

Helostomidae (hel-os'tom-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Helostoma + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, represented by the genus Helostoma. The mouth is very small, and the teeth are confined to the lips and movable. In most other respects they agree with the Anabantidae, and are generally associated with them in the same family. The Helostoma temminckii inhabits the fresh waters of Java.

Helot (hē'lot or hel'ot), n. [L. Helotæ, prop. Helotæ or Ilotæ, < Gr. ἑλωτάς or ἑλωτες, pl. of ἑλωτός or ἑλωτος, a Helot; said to be so named from ἑλος, a town of Sparta, whose inhabitants were enslaved, but more prob. from the pass. of ἑλεῖν, 2d aor. associated with pres. alpeiv, take.] 1. One of a class of serfs among the ancient Spartans who were owned by the state, were bound to the soil under allotment to landholders, and fulfilled all servile functions. The Helots paid their masters a fixed proportion of the products of the ground cultivated by them. They served as light-armed troops in war, and in great emergencies bodies of them were organized as regular or heavy-armed troops, in which case they might be manumitted as a reward for bravery. They were descendants of captives of war, most of them probably of the conquered Achaean aborigines of Laconia; and they were very cruelly treated, and often systematically massacred, to keep down their numbers and prevent them from organized revolt.

The old Spartans had a wiser method, and went out and hunted down their Helots, and speared and spitted them, when they grew too numerous.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, III. 4.

Hence—2. [cap. or l. c.] A serf or slave, in general; a servile person; one subject to the orders and caprices of another.

Those unfortunates, the Helots of mankind, more or less numerous in every community.

Is. Taylor.

helotage (hē'lot-āj or hel'ot-āj), n. [helot + -age.] The state or condition of being a helot; servage. Carlyle.

Helotia (hē-lō'ti-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Helotium.] A family of discomycetous fungi, including the groups Ciboria and Heloti. Boudin.

Helotici (hē-lō'ti-si), n. pl. [NL., < Helotium.] Same as Pileolares.

helotism (hē'lot-izm or hel'ot-izm), n. [helot + -ism.] 1. The system of servage maintained at Sparta, or one resembling it. See Helot, 1.—2. The condition of the Helots or Spartan serfs, or of helots in the extended sense; servile bondage.

Helotium (hē-lō'ti-um), n. [NL., perhaps < Gr. ἥλωτος, nail-shaped, < ἥλος, a nail.] A genus of discomycetous fungi, type of the Helotia. The disk is always open, at first punctiform, then dilated, convex or concave, and naked; the excipulum is waxy, free, and externally naked.

helotry (hē-lō't-ri or hel'ot-ri), n. [helot + -ry.] 1. The condition of a Helot; serfdom; slavery.—2. Helots in a collective sense; a body of persons in a condition similar to that of the ancient Helots.

The Helotry of Mammon are not, in our day, so easily enforced to content themselves as the peasantry of that happy period, as Mr. Southey considers it, which elapsed between the fall of the feudal and the rise of commercial tyranny.

Macaulay, Southey's Colloquies.

help (help), v.; pret. and pp. helped (formerly holp and holpen), ppr. helping. [ME. helpen (pret. halp, pl. holpen, pp. holpen, holpe), < AS. helpan (pret. healp, pl. hulpon, pp. holpen) = OS. helpan = OFries. helfa = D. MLG. 2. Pertaining to or connected with blood, blood-vessels, or blood-circulation; vascular; circulatory: as, the hemal system.

3. Situated on the side of the body, with reference to the vertebral axis, which contains the heart and great blood-vessels; ventral: the opposite of neurad. In man the hemal aspect is the whole front of the body, the opposite of the back. In other vertebrates the under side is hemal. The epithet is chiefly used in this technical sense. Hemal arch, that portion of a typical vertebra which is on the hemal side of the vertebral axis, forming a hoop or ring to inclose and protect the heart and other viscera, as the neural arches inclose the main nervous system. The ribs and breast-bone constitute a series of hemal arches. See cut under endoskeleton.

Hemal cavity, the body-cavity or celoma; the thoracic-abdominal cavity in general, containing the heart, lungs, intestines, etc.; so called because it is on the hemal aspect of the body and formed or inclosed by hemal arches.

Hemal flexure. See flexure. Hemal space, a cavity or space in which blood accumulates. Hemal spine, (a) In Owen's terminology, the median ventral or hinal element of a hemal arch, as one of the segments or pieces of the sternum or breast-bone, articulated on either hand with a hemapophysis. (b) A median process of the hemal side of the body of a vertebra; a hypapophysis: a rare use.

In a half-wild rabbit from Sandon Park, a hemal spine was moderately well developed on the under side of the twelfth dorsal vertebra, and I have seen this in no other specimen. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 127.

hemalopia, hemalopia (hem-a-lō'pi-ā), n. [NL. hemalopia, < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ὄψις, blind, < ὥψ, eye; cf. hemeralopia.] Hemophthalmia.

hemapoiesis, hemapoiesis (hem'a-poi-ēs'is), n. Same as hematopoiesis.

hemapoietic, hemapoietic (hem'a-poi-et'ik), a. Same as hematopoietic.

hemapophyseal, hemapophyseal (hem'a-pō-fiz'ē-al), a. Same as hemapophyseal.

hemapophysial, hemapophysial (hem'a-pō-fiz'ī-al), a. [< hemapophysis, hemapophysis, + -al.] Pertaining to or resembling a hemapophysis.

hemapophysis, hemapophysis (hem-a-pōf'is), n.; pl. hemapophyses, hemapophyses (-sēs). [NL. hemapophysis, < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ἀπόφυσις, a process, as of bone: see apophysis.] The second element of the typical hemal arch of a vertebra, situated between the pleurapophysis and the hemal spine, corresponding in part to the neurapophysis of the neural arch.

Thus, a costal cartilage, intervening between the bony part of a rib and a segment of the sternum, is a hemapophysis. See cut under endoskeleton.

hemarthrus, hemarthrus (hē-mār'thrus), n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ἄρθρον, joint.] In pathol., the presence of blood in the synovial cavity of a joint.

hemastatic, hemastatic (hem-a-stat'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + στατικός, causing to stand: see static.] I. a. 1. Relating to hemastatics.—2. In med., serving to arrest the escape or flow of blood; arresting hemorrhage; styptic.

II. n. A remedy for stanching a flow of blood. hemastatics, hemastatics (hem-a-stat'iks), n. [Pl. of hemastatic, hemastatic: see -ics.] The hydrostatics of the blood in living bodies.

hemat-. See hemato-.

hematachometer, hematachometer (hem'a-ta-kom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + E. tachometer.] An instrument for measuring the velocity of the blood by making it flow through a chamber in which a pendulum hangs.

For . . . [measuring the velocity of the blood] Vierordt constructed the hematachometer.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 97.

hematangionosus, hematangionosus (hem'a-tan'ji-on'ō-sus), n. [NL. hematangionosus, < Gr. αἷμα(τ), blood, + ὑγιεινός, a vessel, + νόσος, disease.] Disease of the blood-vessels. Also hematangionosus, hematangionosus.

hematein, hematein (hem-a-tē'in), n. [< Gr. αἷμα(τ), blood, + -ein.] An organic principle (C₁₆H₁₂O₆ + 3aq.) derived from the coloring matter of logwood. It forms dark-violet crystalline scales, which show by reflected light a greenish hue, and are sometimes observable on logwood. Also hematine, hemateine.

hematemesis, hematemesis (hem-a-tēm'e-sis), n. [NL. hematemesis, < Gr. αἷμα(τ), blood, + ἔμετιν, vomit: see emetic.] In pathol., a vomiting of blood.

hematemetic, hematemetic (hem'a-tē-met'ik), a. [< hematemesis, hematemesis, after emetic.] Pertaining to or affected with hematemesis.

hematherm, hematherm (hem'a-thēr'm), n. [< Hematotherma.] A warm-blooded animal; one of the Hematotherma.

hemathermal, hemathermal (hem-a-thēr'mal), a. [< hematherm, hematherm, + -al.] Pertaining or relating to the hematherms; hemathermal.

hemathermous, hemathermous (hem-a-thēr'mus), a. [< hematherm, hematherm, + -ous.] Same as hemathermal.

hemathidrosis, hemathidrosis (hem'a-thi-drō'sis), n. [NL. hemathidrosis, < Gr. αἷμα(τ), blood, + ἵδρος, sweat.] In pathol., the effusion on the skin of blood or blood-stained liquid without gross or evident lesions.

hemathorax, hemathorax (hem-a-thō'raks), n. Same as hemathorax.

hematic, hematic (hē-mat'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. αἱματικός, of the blood, < αἷμα(τ), blood: see hemato-] I. a. 1. In anat. and physiol., of or pertaining to, or occurring in, the blood; sanguineous; hemal.

Again, who has not observed the effect of depressing emotions to weaken the constitution and engender hematic changes, resulting in dangerous anemia?

Allen and Neurol., VI. 543.

2. In med., effecting an improvement in the condition of the blood.

II. n. A medicine which effects a change in the condition of the blood.

hematics, hematics (hē-mat'iks), n. [Pl. of hematic; hematic: see -ics.] That branch of physiological and medical science which is concerned with the blood.

hematidrosis, hematidrosis (hem'a-ti-drō'sis), n. Same as hemathidrosis.

hematin, hematin (hem'a-tin), n. [< NL. hematina; < Gr. αἷμα(τ), blood, + -in². Cf. Gr. αἱματός, of blood.] 1. A brown amorphous substance derived from hemoglobin in the blood, also forming scales of a bluish-black color with a metallic luster.

He [Mr. Sorby] has . . . shown how it [blood] may be detected under the most unfavorable conditions, provided that a trace of hematin has escaped decomposition or removal.

J. N. Lockyer, Spectroscope, p. 86.

2. Same as hematoxylin.

Also spelled hematine, hæmatine.

hematinic, hematinic (hem-a-tin'ik), a. [< hematin, hematin, + -ic.] A medicine, as a preparation of iron, which tends to increase the amount of hemoglobin in the blood.

hematinometer, hematinometer (hem'a-ti-nom'e-tēr), n. Same as hemoglobiometer.

hematinuria, hematinuria (hem'a-ti-nū'ri-ā), n. [NL. hematinuria, < hematina, hematin, + Gr. οὔρον, urine.] In pathol., the presence of hematin in the urine: a term once used specifically to designate what is now called hemoglobinuria.

hematite, hematite (hem'a-tit), n. [< L. hematites, < Gr. αἱματῖτης (sc. λίθος, stone), red iron ore, prop. adj., blood-like, < αἷμα(τ), blood.] Native anhydrous iron sesquioxide, or red oxide of iron, Fe_2O_3 . It crystallizes in the rhombohedral system, and occurs in iron-black crystals with brilliant metallic luster (called specular iron and iron-glass), also in thin tabular crystals or scales, often red by transmitted light. More commonly it is massive, with structure varying from compact to foliated and micaceous (iron-mica or micaceous iron ore), also to columnar and fibrous, and further to earthy (red ochre) and impure argillaceous (ironstone) kinds. All varieties have a red streak. It is one of the most valuable ores of iron, and is mined in large quantities, as in the Marquette region of Lake Superior. It is sometimes called bloodstone and olygite iron (for oligite); also often red hematite, to distinguish it from the related hydrated ore, brown hematite, or limonite, which has a brown streak. See cut under reniform.

hematitic, hematitic (hem-a-tit'ik), a. [hematite, hematite, + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or resembling hematite.—2. Of a blood-red color; also, dull-red with a mixture of brown.

It (Agelaius phoeniceus) never, however, has the hematitic tint of the red in A. tricolor.

S. F. Baird, Birds of N. A. (1858), p. 527.

hemato-, hæmato-, hemo-, hæmo- [Strictly hemato-, hæmato-, contr. hemo-, hæmo-, and these forms reduced to hemat-, hæmat-, hem-, hæm-, before a second element beginning with a vowel; so L. and NL. hemato-, hæmo-, reduced hemat-, hæm-, < Gr. haima-, and contr. haimo-, reduced before a vowel to haima-, haimo-; combining form of haima, blood. The form hema-, hæma-, in E. and NL. compounds, repr. the Gr. word before a second element beginning with a consonant (as in hemachrome or hemachrome, hemastatic, etc.), is contrary to Gr. usage. The spelling of words containing this element wavers between hem- and hæm-. Properly, it should be hem- in L. and NL. terms, and such E. forms as are not yet entirely naturalized; but hæm- in E. words entirely naturalized.] An element in many compounds, chiefly scientific, meaning 'blood.'

hematob-ious, hæmatob-ious, hæm- [As hematob-ious, hæmatob-ious, + -ic.] Same as hematobious.

hematobious, hæmatobious (hem-a-tō'bi-us), a. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + bios, life.] Living in the blood, as a parasite; sanguicolous.

hematoblast, hæmatoblast (hem-a-tō-blást), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + blastos, germ.] A form-element of the blood, different from the ordinary red or white corpuscles, being a colorless lenticular disk smaller than red blood-disks and without hemoglobin. Hematoblasts are identified by Hayem with the plaquettes described by Bizzozero in 1863. Also called blood-plate and blood-platelet.

hematobranchiate, hæmatobranchiate (hem'a-tō-brang'ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hæmatobranchia.

hematocele, hæmatocele (hem'a-tō-sel), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + kēlē, tumor.] A tumor filled with blood. Also called blood-swelling.

hematochyluria, hæmatochyluria (hem'a-tō-ki-lū'ri-ā), n. [NL. hæmatochyluria, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + chylōs, juice (chyle), + oûron, urine.] In pathol., the admixture of blood with chylous urine.

hematocele, hæmatocele (hem'a-tō-sē'li-ā), n. [NL. hæmatocele, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + kolē, the belly.] In pathol., effusion or escape of blood into the peritoneal cavity. Thomas.

hematocryal, hæmatocryal (hem-a-tōk'ri-āl), a. and n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + krys, cold-blooded; specifically, of or pertaining to the Hematocrya: opposed to hematothelial.

II. a. Cold-blooded vertebrate; one of the Hæmatocrya.

hematocrystallin, hæmatocrystallin (hem'a-tō-kris'ta-lin), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + krystallos, ice, crystal, + -in.] Same as hemoglobin.

hematogenesis, hæmatogenesis (hem'a-tō-jen'sis), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + E. genesis.] The formation of blood.

hematogenic, hæmatogenic (hem'a-tō-jen'ik), a. [As hematogen-ous, hæmatogen-ous, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to hematogenesis.

Intense hematogenic icterus followed, with extensive decomposition of the blood. Medical News, LII. 409.

hematogenous, hæmatogenous (hem'a-tō-jen-us), a. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + -genēs, producing: see -genous.] Arising in or from the blood.

hematoglobulin, hæmatoglobulin (hem'a-tō-glō'b-in), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + L. globus, globe, + -in.] Same as hemoglobin.

hematoglobulin, hæmatoglobulin (hem'a-tō-glō'b-in), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + L. globulus, globule, + -in.] Same as hemoglobin.

hematography, hæmatography (hem-a-tōg'ra-ā), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + -graphia, < γράφειν, write.] A description of the blood.

hematoid, hæmatoid (hem'a-tōid), a. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + eidos, form.] Resembling blood.

hematoidin, hæmatoidin (hem-a-tō'id-in), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + -in.] A crystalline substance often found in extravasated blood, resembling bilirubin closely, if not identical with it. Also spelled hematidine, hæmatidine.

hematolite, hæmatolite (hem'a-tō-lit), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + lithos, stone.] A hydrous arseniate of manganese, aluminum, and magnesium, occurring in small rhombohedral crystals of a red color at Nordmark in Sweden. Also called diadelphite.

hematological, hæmatological (hem'a-tō-loj'ik-āl), a. Pertaining to hematology.

hematology, hæmatology (hem-a-tōl'ō-jī), n. [NL. hæmatologia, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + -logia, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The branch of biology which relates to the blood. Also hematologia, hæmatologia.

hematoma, hæmatoma (hem-a-tō'mā), n.; pl. hematomata, hæmatomata (-mā-tā). [NL. hæmatoma, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + -oma.] In pathol., a swelling filled with extravasated blood. Also hematome, hæmatome.

hematomatous, hæmatomatous (hem-a-tōm'-a-tus), a. [Hæmatoma(-t-), hæmatoma(-t-), + -ous.] Having or resembling hematoma.

The dura was universally adherent on both hemispheres, and there were hematomatous effusions in both dural sacs. Medical News, XLIX. 586.

hematome, hæmatome (hem'a-tōm), n. [NL. hæmatoma: see hematoma.] Same as hematoma.

hematometra, hæmatometra (hem'a-tō-mē-trā), n. [NL. hæmatometra, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + métra, the womb (L. matrix).] In pathol., a collection of blood in the uterus.

hematope, hæmatope (hem'a-tōp), n. [Hæmatopus.] A book-name of an oyster-catcher, as Hæmatopus ostrilegus; one of the Hæmatopodidae.

hematopedesis, hæmatopedesis (hem'a-tō-pē-dē'sis), n. [NL. hæmatopedesis, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + (dia)πόσις, an oozing through: see diapedesis.] Same as diapedesis.

hematopericardium, hæmatopericardium (hem'a-tō-per-i-kār'di-um), n. [NL. hæmatopericardium, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + περικάρδιον, pericardium.] The presence of blood in the pericardial cavity. Also hemopericardium, hæmopericardium.

hematophilia, hæmatophilia (hem'a-tō-fil'i-ā), n. Same as hemophilia.

hematophiline, hæmatophiline (hem-a-tōf'i-lin), a. [Gr. hæmatophilina.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hæmatophilina.

hematophobia, hæmatophobia (hem'a-tō-fō-bi-ā), n. [NL. hæmatophobia, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + φοβία, fear.] An inordinate fear or horror at the sight of blood. Thomas.

hematopoiesis, hæmatopoiesis (hem'a-tō-poi-ē'sis), n. [NL. hæmatopoiesis, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + ποίσις, a making.] The formation of blood, usually with especial reference to the corpuscles.

hematopoietic, hæmatopoietic (hem'a-tō-poi-et'ik), a. [Gr. haimatopoietikós, < haimatopoiein, make into blood, < haima(-r-), blood, + ποιεῖν, make: see poetic.] Pertaining to hematopoiesis.

hematorachis, hæmatrachis (hem'a-tōr'ā-kis), n. [*NL. hæmatrachis (prop. hæmatorrhachis), < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + ράχις, the spine.] In pathol., an effusion of blood in, about, or between the spinal meninges.

hematosalpinx, hæmatosalpinx (hem'a-tō-sal'pinks), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + σάλπιγξ, a trumpet.] In pathol., the presence of blood in a Fallopian tube. Also hemosalpinx, hæmosalpinx.

hematose, hæmatose (hem'a-tōs), a. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + -ose.] Full of blood. Thomas, Med. Diet.

hematosin, hæmatosin (hem-a-tō'sin), n. [As hematosin, hæmatosin, + -in.] The coloring matter of the blood, which in a dry state is used for making Prussian blue. See hematin, 1. Also spelled hematosine, hæmatosine.

hematosis, hæmatosis (hem-a-tō'sis), n. [NL. hæmatosis, < Gr. haimatōsin, make bloody, < haima(-r-), blood.] In physiol.: (a) The formation of blood; sanguification. (b) The conversion of venous into arterial blood; arterIALIZATION.

hematostibiite, hæmatostibiite (hem'a-tō-stib'it), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + L. stibium, antimony, + -ite.] An antimoniate of manganese and iron, occurring in black embedded grains, appearing blood-red in thin splinters. It is found in Sweden.

hematothermal, hæmatothermal (hem'a-tō-thér'mal), a. [As Hematotherma + -al.] Warm-blooded; specifically, of or pertaining to the Hæmatotherma.

Thus Vertebrates might be primarily divided into . . . Hæmatothermal, having the four-chambered heart, spongy lungs, hot blood; and Hæmatocryal, having less perfect breathing organs, less complex heart, with cold blood. Owen.

hematothorax, hæmatothorax (hem'a-tō-thō'raks), n. [NL. hæmatothorax, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + θώραξ, breastplate: see thorax.] In pathol., the presence of blood in a pleural cavity. Also hemathorax, hæmathorax.

hematoxylin, hæmatoxylin (hem-a-tōk'si-lin), n. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + ξύλον, wood, + -in.] A dye obtained from the logwood-tree, Hæmatoxylin Campechianum, and having the chemical formula $\text{C}_{16}\text{H}_{14}\text{O}_6$ and $2\text{H}_2\text{O}$. It forms small crystalline laminae, which when pure are colorless and free from bitter or astringent taste. It affords the fine red, blue, and purple colors prepared from logwood by the action of an alkali and the oxygen of the air. The staining-fluid used in vegetable histology is made by dissolving .36 gram of hematoxylin in 10 grams of water, and adding a few drops of an alum solution, which acts as a mordant in fixing the color. It is one of the best staining-fluids known for the nucleus, coloring it a deep blue. Also hematoxyline, hæmatoxiline.

hematozoan, hæmatozoan (hem'a-tō-zō'an), n. [As Hematozoa + -an.] One of the Hæmatozoa.

hematozoic, hæmatozoic (hem'a-tō-zō'ik), a. [As Hematozoa + -ic.] Living in blood, as a parasitic animalcule; hematobious.

hematozymotic, hæmatozymotic (hem'a-tō-zī-mot'ik), a. [Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + E. zymot-ic.] Pertaining to a fermentation of the blood.

hematuria, hæmaturia (hem-a-tū'ri-ā), n. [NL. hæmaturia, < Gr. haima(-r-), blood, + οὖρον, urine.] In pathol., the presence of blood in the urine.

hematuric, hæmaturic (hem-a-tū'rik), a. [Gr. hæmaturia, hæmaturia, + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with hematuria.

hemble (hem'bl), n. [E. dial., also hambl; cf. ham3.] A hovel; a stable; a shed. [Prov. Eng.] hemelytron, hæmatelion. See hemelytrum.

hemeralopia, hæmatopia (hem'e-ra-lō'pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ημέρα, a day, + ἀλᾶς, blind, + ὤψ (ὤψ), eye.] In pathol., a defect of sight in consequence of which distinct vision is possible only in artificial or dim light; day-blindness. The term is also used, however, to express exactly the opposite defect of vision. See nyctalopia.

hemeralopic, hæmatopic (hem'e-ra-lōp'ik), a. [Gr. hemeralopia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with hemeralopia.

Hemeristia (hem'e-ris'ti-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ημέρα, day.] A genus of fossil neuropterous insects, related to the ephemerids or May-flies. Dana, 1864.

Hemeristiidae (hem'e-ris'ti-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hemeristia + -idae.] A family of fossil neuropterous insects, typified by the genus Hemeristia, from the Carboniferous rocks of Illinois. They were of large size, with quadrangular prothorax narrower than the other thoracic segments and ample wings twice as broad beyond the middle as at the base, with the costal border convex in its outer half. When at rest the wings completely overlapped; they had numerous prominent cross-veins, but no reticulations. The type is Hemeristia occidentalis of Dana.

Hemerobaptist (hem'e-rō-bap'tist), n. [Gr. ημέροβαπτισται, pl., a Christian sect who were baptized daily (Epiphanius), < ημέρα, day, + βαπτίζω, baptist: see baptist.] A member of an old Jewish sect which used daily ceremonial ablutions, or of an early Christian sect which believed in daily baptism: little is known of either.

In the Word of God . . . one Baptism is mentioned (which place the Hemerobaptist or daily dippers slighted).

Ep. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 286.

hemerobian (hem'e-rō-bi'an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hemerobiidae.

II. a. A neuropterous insect of the family Hemerobiidae.

Hemerobida (hem'e-rōb'i-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Hemerobius + -ida.] A superfamily group of neuropterous insects, of the suborder Planipennia, chiefly represented by the family Hemerobiidae, but also made by some to include the Myrmeleontidae, etc.

II. n. A gecko of the genus Hemidactylus. hemidactylous (hem-i-dak'ti-lus), a. Same as hemidactyl.
Hemidactylus (hem-i-dak'ti-lus), n. [NL.:
 see hemidactyl.] A genus of gecko-lizards, having the toes dilated as is usual in Geconidae, but covered below with transverse imbricated plates in two series, and the body and tail without appendages. It contains some of the commonest species, widely distributed in the warmer parts of the globe, such as H. maculatus, an abundant Asiatic species: H. frenatus, the cheecha of Ceylon; and H. verruculatus, a warty Mediterranean species.

hemidemisemiquaver (hem-i-dem-i-sem-i-kwā'vēr), n. [hemi, half, + semi, half, + quaver, q. v.] In musical notation, a note equal in duration to one half of a demisemiquaver or one eighth of a quaver; a sixty-fourth note: written as shown at a.

Hemidemisemiquaver rest, in musical notation, a rest equal in duration to a hemidemisemiquaver; a sixty-fourth rest: written as shown at b.

Hemidesmæ (hem-i-des'mē-ē), n. [NL., < Hemidesmus + -æ.] A subdivision of the Asclepiadaceæ made by Reichenbach in 1837 to receive the anomalous genus Hemidesmus.

Hemidesmus (hem-i-des'mus), n. [NL. (so called in allusion to the filaments), < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + δεσμός, a band.] A genus of twining plants, natural order Asclepiadaceæ, having opposite leaves and cymes of small greenish flowers. H. Indicus yields the Indian sarsaparilla, a reputed alterative, diuretic, and tonic.

hemidiapente (hem-i-di-a-pen'tē), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + διάπεντε, a fifth in music: see diapente.] In Gr. music, a diminished or imperfect fifth.

hemiditone (hem-i-dī'tōn), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + δίτονος, of two tones: see ditone.] In Gr. music, a minor third. According to the Greek tuning, this was somewhat less than a modern minor third, and dissonant.

hemidiploidion (hem-i-dip-lō'id-i-ōn), n.; pl. hemidiploidia (-iā). [Gr. ἡμιδiploidion, < ἡμι-, half, + διπλόδιον: see diploidion.] In anc. Gr. costume, either a short form of the diploidion or one covering only the front of the person. See also quotation.

A diploidion worn only in front was called a hemidiploidion. Encyc. Brit., VI. 454.

hemidomatic (hem-i-dō-mat'ik), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + οἰκία, a house.] Resembling or pertaining to a hemidome.

hemidome (hem-i-dōm), n. [Gr. ἡμι- + dome: see dome, 5.] In crystal, an orthodome in the monoclinic system: so called because only two planes belong to any given symbol. Corresponding forms are called minus or plus, according as they are opposite the obtuse or the acute axial angle.

hemidrachm (hem-i-dram), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + δραχμή, q. v.] An ancient coin of the value of half a drachma; a half-drachm.

hemidystrophia (hem-i-dis-trō'fi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + δυσ-, ill, + τροφή, nourishment, < τρέφω, nourish.] In bot., the partial nourishment of trees, due to the unequal distribution of the roots arising from obstruction to their growth in some directions, or from other causes.

hemiedric (hem-i-ed'rik), a. Same as hemihedral.

hemelytra, n. Plural of hemelytrum.

hemelytral (hem-i-el'i-tral), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + ἐλ-, ill, + τροφή, nourishment.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a hemelytrum.

hemelytrum, hemelytron (hem-i-el'i-trum, -tron), n.; pl. hemelytra (-trā). [NL., < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + ἐλ-, ill, + τροφή, nourishment: see elytrum.] 1. The fore wing of hemipterous and especially heteropterous insects, coriaceous at the base and membranous at the tip, whence the name. Besides being thus divisible into two principal parts, the hemelytrum proper, or corium, and the terminal membrane, most hemelytra include two other recognizable portions, called the clavus and the cuneus or appendix. The latter is often wanting. See cut under clavus.

2. In Vermes, one of the large imbricated scales which lie in double series along the back of certain scale-bearing marine annelids, as the sea-mice or Aphroditidae. They are borne upon the upper parapodia, subserve the purposes of protection and respiration, and are often very conspicuous, as in the genus Hermione.

Also hemelytrum, hemelytron.

hemiencephala, n. Plural of hemiencephalon.

hemiencephalic (hem-i-en-se-fal'ik or -sef'al-ik), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + ἐν-σεφαλικός, pertaining to the head.] Pertaining to the hemiencephalon.

hemiencephalon (hem-i-en-sef'al-lon), n.; pl. hemiencephala (-lā). [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + ἐν-σεφαλικός, brain: see encephalon.] Half of an encephalon which has been hemisected, or longitudinally bisected.

Hemigale (hē-mī'gā-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + γάλη, contr. form of γάλην, a kind of weasel.] 1. A genus of carnivorous quadrupeds, of the family Viverridae, the type and only representative of a subfamily Hemigaleinae, based upon H. zebra of Borneo. Also written Hemigalea and Hemigaleus.—2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

Hemigaleinae (hem-i-gā-lē-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hemigale + -inae.] A subfamily of subplanigrade Viverridae, represented by the genus Hemigale. They have a strong sectorial tooth with a large tubercular ledge, the upper molars large and broad, the soles partly hairy, and a ringed tail moderate in length and not prehensile as in the Paradoxurus, to which these animals are closely related. Usually Hemigalinae.

hemigamous (hē-mī'gā-mus), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + γάμος, marriage.] In bot., having one of the two florets in the same spikelet neuter, and the other unisexual, whether male or female: said of grasses.

hemigeometer (hem-i-jē-om'ē-tēr), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μέτρον, measure.] In entom., one of certain lepidopterous larvae of the family Noctuidæ. They have six prolegs, two ventral pairs and one anal pair, and when walking raise or loop a part of the body, thus somewhat resembling the true geometrids or loopworms.

hemiglottidean (hem-i-glo-tid'ē-an), a. In ornith., specifically, of or pertaining to the Hemiglottides.

Hemiglottides (hem-i-glot'i-dēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + γλῶττα, tongue, + -ides.] A superfamily of desmognathous gallatorial birds, founded by Nitzsch upon the ibises and spoonbills, associated on account of the small size of the tongue and other characters. The group forms a part of the Pelargomorphæ of Huxley, and it exactly corresponds to the Ibides of Coues.

I associate in this division [Pelargomorphæ] the Herodias, Pelargi, and Hemiglottides of Nitzsch, the last group including the genera Ibis and Platalea.

Huxley, Proc. Zool. Soc., 1867, p. 461.

hemiglyph (hem-i-glif), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + γλῶφ, a carving.] In arch., the half-groove or -glyph at the edge of the triglyph in the Doric entablature.

hemignathous (hē-mī'gā-nā-thus), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + γνάθος, jaw.] In ornith., half-beaked—that is, having either mandible much shorter than the other; hemirhamphine.

Hemignathus (hē-mī'gā-nā-thus), n. [NL.: see hemignathous.] A genus of sun-birds, of the family Nectariniidae, of the Sandwich Islands, having a bowed bill with the lower mandible about half as long as the upper one (whence the name), as H. lucida. Lichtenstein, 1838.

hemigyrrus (hem-i-jī'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + γύρος, a circle.] In bot., same as foli-cle.

hemihedral (hem-i-hē'dral), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + ἑδρα, base.] 1. In mineral., exhibiting hemihedrism; having, as a crystal, only half the number of planes belonging to any particular form which the law of symmetry requires.—2. In math., substituting negative for positive signs in regular alternation.

Also hemihedric, hemihedric.

hemihedrally (hem-i-hē'dral-i), adv. In a hemihedral manner.

hemihedric (hem-i-hē'drik), a. [As hemihedron + -ic.] Same as hemihedral.

hemihedrism (hem-i-hē'drizm), n. [As hemihedron + -ism.] In crystal, that property of crystals in accordance with which they have only half the number of planes required by normal or holohedral symmetry. See holohedrism. For example, if of the eight planes of an octahedron only four are present, the two opposite above and the two opposite below, the resulting form is a tetrahedron; this, like the complementary hemihedral forms in other similar cases, is designated as plus (+) or minus (−), according to which set of four alternate planes is present. Both plus and minus tetrahedrons may be present together, and an octahedron of a hemihedral species like sphenalerite is regarded as made up of these two forms, the two sets of planes being unlike physically (for example, as shown by pyro-electric phenomena), even when not distinguished geometrically. In the isometric system the type of hemihedrism illustrated by the tetrahedron in which all the parts belonging to half the octahedron are present (holohedrism) is called enantiomorph or tetrahedral hemihedrism; this yields independent forms also in the case of the two tris-octahedrons and the hexoctahedron. In the same system parallel or pyritohedral hemihedrism is illustrated by the pentagonal dodecahedron or pyritohedron, the hemihedral form of the tetrakis-hexahedron; in this, half the parts of all the octahedra are present (hemiholohedral). The only other independent form of this type of hemihedrism is the diploid, the hemihedral form of the hexoctahedron. (See cut under diploid.) The other forms, however, also show the hemihedrism; thus, a cube of pyrites has only its alternate edges similar. There is also the rare gyroidal or trapezohedral hemihedrism, which, as applied to the hexoctahedron, yields plus and minus forms which are enantiomorphous. Sphenoidal hemihedrism of the tetragonal and orthorhombic systems is similar to the tetrahedral hemihedrism of the isometric system; this is also true of the rhombohedral hemihedrism of the hexagonal pyramid system, which yields the rhombohedron from a hexagonal pyramid and the scalenohedron from a 12-sided pyramid. Pyramidal hemihedrism in the tetragonal and orthorhombic systems yields a 4-sided 6-sided pyramid respectively from an 8-sided or 12-sided pyramid; here the parts present are not those alternate to each other above and below, but each plane above has a corresponding one below, the adjacent pair above and below being absent. Hemihedral forms are themselves, in certain cases, subject to hemihedrism, the result being quarter- or tetrahedral forms. See tetrahedrism and hemimorphism. Also called hemihedry, hemisymmetry.

hemihedron (hem-i-hē'dron), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + ἑδρα, a seat, base.] A hemihedral solid, as the tetrahedron.

hemihedry (hem-i-hē'dri), n. [As hemihedron + -y.] Same as hemihedrism.

hemiholohedral (hem-i-hol-ō-hē'dral), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + holohedral.] In crystal, having half the whole number of planes in all the octants: sometimes said of the parallel hemihedral forms of the isometric system. See hemihedrism.

Hemileia (hem-i-lē-i-ā), n. [NL., appar. < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + λεῖος, smooth.] A genus of fungi, of which the principal species, H. vastatrix, is very destructive to coffee-plants in Ceylon plantations. The genus is a member of the Uredineæ, and closely allied to Uromyces. It is described as forming little white patches on the under side of the leaves, and consists of minute tufts of flexuous threads surmounted by a single subreniform spore attached obliquely at the base. The upper side of the affected leaf has the appearance of being burnt.

Hemimetabola (hem-i-me-tab'ō-lā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μεταβολή, transformation. Cf. hemimetaboly.] Insects which undergo incomplete or partial metamorphosis; a subclass or superorder of hexapod insects, including a series intermediate between Ametabola on the one hand and Metabola on the other. The group is sometimes used as coterminous with Hemiptera in a broad sense, and is then divided into Hemiptera, Heteroptera, and Thysanoptera; or it is extended to cover the three usual orders Hemiptera, Orthoptera, and Pseudoneuroptera. Also called Homonoma.

hemimetabolic (hem-i-met-a-bol'ik), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μεταβολή, transformation.] Characterized by hemimetaboly; pertaining to hemimetaboly, or to the Hemimetabola; hemimetamorphic; homomorphic.

hemimetaboly (hem-i-me-tab'ō-lī), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μεταβολή, transformation: see metaboly.] Incomplete metamorphosis; imperfect transformation, as of an insect.

hemimetamorphic (hem-i-met-a-mōr'fik), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μεταμορφωσις, transformation.] Exhibiting hemimetamorphosis; undergoing incomplete transformation; hemimetabolic.

hemimetamorphosis (hem-i-met-a-mōr'fō-sis), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μεταμορφωσις, transformation.] Incomplete metamorphosis. It involves considerable although gradual changes from the new-born young to the adult, as in some fishes.

In some pelagic forms Hemimetamorphosis may occur, or very considerable alterations in their growth and development.

Day, Fishes of Great Britain and Ireland, II. xci.

hemimorph (hem-i-mōrf), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μορφή, form.] A crystal exhibiting hemimorphism.

hemimorphic (hem-i-mōr'fik), a. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μορφή, form.] Having, as a crystal, the two ends of the same axis modified with unlike planes.

hemimorphism (hem-i-mōr'fizm), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μορφή, form.] In crystal, the property of having the opposite extremities unlike in their planes or modifications. It is commonly observed in the case of crystals of tourmaline, calamine, and some other species. Such crystals usually show marked pyro-electrical phenomena. See pyro-electricity.

hemimorphite (hem-i-mōr'fit), n. [Gr. ἡμι-, half, + μορφή, form.] Calamine, or hydrous silicate of zinc: a name given in allusion to the common hemimorphic character of the crystals.

hemina (hē-mī'nā), n.; pl. heminae (-nē). [L., also emina, < Gr. ἡμίνα, a Sicilian measure, half the ἐκτέτα (L. sextarius), < ἡμι-, half, + ἡμιον, a half.] An ancient Roman and Greek measure, equivalent to the cotyle. It contained .271 liters, or .572 United States pints.

heminget, n. See heminget?

hemiocholon (hem-i-ō-bō'li-on), n.; pl. hemiocholia (-iā). [Gr. ἡμιόχολον, < ἡμι-, half, + ὀχλός, an obol.] A coin of ancient Athens, of the value of half an obol.

hemiola (hem-i-ō'li-ā), n. [Gr. ἡμιόλια, sc. διάστασις, an interval one half more, also a verse consisting of a foot and a half, fem. of ἡμιόλιος, one and a half: see hemiolio.] In medieval music: (a) The interval or relation of the perfect fifth: so called because produced on the monochord by shortening the string to two thirds of its full length. (b) A group of three notes introduced in the midst of a piece in place of two; a triplet.

hemiotic (hem-i-ol'ik), a. [L. hemiolus (< Gr. ἡμιόλιος, containing one and a half, half as much again, < ἡμι, half, + λίος, whole) + -ic.] In anc. pros., constituting the proportion of $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, or of 3 to 2: as, the hemiotic ratio (of these and arsis); characterized by such a proportion of thesis and arsis: as, hemiotic rhythm; a hemiotic foot; the hemiotic class of feet. The hemiotic class is also sometimes called the Pœmia, the two other principal classes of feet being the diplosic, double, trochaic, or iambic, and the isorhythmic, equal, or dactylic. See Pœmia.

hemione (hem-i-on), n. [< hemionus.] The dziggetai, half-ass, or wild ass of Asia, Equus hemionus or Asinus hemionus. See cut under dziggetai.

hemionus (hem-i-mi'ō-nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμιονος, a 'half-ass,' i. e. a mule, < ἡμι, half, + ὄνος, an ass.] The specific name of Equus or Asinus hemionus, the hemione, half-ass, or dziggetai: used also as the English name of this animal. See cut under dziggetai.

A hybrid has been figured by Dr. Gray (he informs me that he knows of a second case) from the ass and the hemionus; and this hybrid, though the ass only occasionally has stripes on his legs and the hemionus has none and has not even a shoulder-stripe, nevertheless had all four legs barred. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 163.

Hemiphrya (hem-i-ōf'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι, half, + φρύς = E. brow.] A remarkable genus of acinetans, or suctorial tentaculiferous infusorians, having both prehensile and suctorial processes. H. gemmipara is an example.

hemipia (hem-i-ō-pi-ā), n. [< Gr. ἡμι, half, + ὥπι (ὥπ-), eye.] Same as hemianopsia.

hemipia (hem-i-ōp'ik), a. [< Gr. ἡμι, half, + ὥπι (ὥπ-), eye.] Same as hemianoptic.

hemipopia (hem-i-ōp'is), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι, half, + ὥπις, sight.] Same as hemianopsia.

hemiorthotype (hem-i-ōr'thō-tip), a. [< Gr. ἡμι, half, + ὀρθός, straight, + τύπος, type: see orthotype.] Same as monoclinic.

hemipalmate (hem-i-pal'mat), a. [< hemi + palmate.] Half-webbed; semipalmate.

hemiparaplegia (hem-i-par-a-plē'ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι, half, + παράπληγία, paralysis: see paraplegia.] In pathol., paralysis of one leg.

hemiparesis (hem-i-par-ē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι, half, + πάρεσις, a blackening: see paresis.] Paresis of one lateral half of the body.

hemiparetic (hem-i-pa-ret'ik), a. [< hemiparesis (-ēt-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with hemiparesis.

hemiphractid (hem-i-frak'tid), n. One of the Hemiphractidae.

Hemiphractidae (hem-i-frak'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hemiphractus + -idae.] A family of tailless amphibians, typified by the genus Hemiphractus. They have maxillary as well as peculiar mandibular teeth, subcylindrical sacral diapophyses, coracoids and precoracoids parallel, an omosternum, opisthocœlian vertebrae, and the coccyx attached to two condyles.

The Hemiphractidae include some forms in which the cranial ossification is remarkably developed. This forms a kind of helmet, which develops in some of the species into processes and crests. Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 339.

Hemiphractus (hem-i-frak'tus), n. [NL., lit. 'half-mailed' (cf. cataphract), < Gr. ἡμιφρακτος, half-fenced, < ἡμι, half, + φρακτός, verbal adj. of φράσσειν, fence, stop up.] A genus of tailless amphibians, typical of the family Hemiphractidae.

hemiphrase (hem-i-frāz), n. [< Gr. ἡμι, half, + φράσις, phrase.] In music, a half-phrase, usually occupying only one measure.

hemiplegia (hem-i-plē'ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμιπλήγῃ (-πλήγ-), also ἡμιπληγής, stricken on one side, < ἡμι, half, + πλήγῃ, strike.] In pathol., paralysis that affects one lateral half of the body. Also hemiplegia, hemiplexia.

hemiplegic (hem-i-plē'jik), a. [< hemiplegia + -ic.] Relating to or affected with hemiplegia.

hemiplegia (hem-i-plē-ji), n. Same as hemiplegia.

hemiplexia (hem-i-plēk'si-ā), n. [< Gr. ἡμιπληγία, < ἡμιπλήγῃ, stricken on one side: see hemiplegia.] Same as hemiplegia.

hemipod (hem-i-pod), a. and n. [As Hemipodius.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hemipodii.

II. n. One of the Hemipodii (or Turnicidae); a bird of the genus Hemipodius, an ortygan. Also hemipode.

hemipodan (hem-i-pō-dan), a. Of or pertaining to the hemipods or Hemipodii.

hemipode (hem-i-pōd), n. Same as hemipod.

Hemipodii (hem-i-pō'di-i), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Hemipodius.] An anomalous group of three-toed birds of quail-like aspect, corresponding to the family Turnicidae, and formerly classed among gallinaceous birds; the ortygans, or old-world bush-quails. They resemble the grouse-pigeons (Pterocidae) and tinamous in some respects, and in others are related to the plovers. The vertebrae lack the extensive ankylosis usual in birds; the palatal structure is somewhat agnathognathous; and in some at least there is but one carotid and no crop. The genera Turnix (or Hemipodius), Ortyzelus, and Pedionomus compose the group.

Hemipodius (hem-i-pō'di-us), n. [NL. (so called from the absence of the hind toe), < Gr. ἡμιπῶς (-πῶδ-), half-footed (cf. ἡμιπόδιον, a half-foot), < ἡμι, half, + πῶς (πῶδ-) = E. foot.] The typical genus of Hemipodii: same as Turnix. Reinhardt, 1815.

hemiprism (hem-i-prizm), n. [< hemi + prism.] In crystal., a prism in the triclinic system: so called because it includes in a given case only two planes which are parallel to each other.

hemiprismatic (hem-i-priz-mat'ik), a. [< hemi + prismatic, q. v.] Of or pertaining to a hemiprism: as, some feldspar crystals show hemiprismatic cleavage.

hemipter (hē-mip'tēr), n. One of the Hemiptera.

Hemiptera (hē-mip'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of hemipterus, half-winged: see hemipterous.] An order of the class Insecta, founded by Linnaeus in 1742, embracing a vast number of insects of diverse forms apparently not very closely related in structure, widely different in mode of life, and collectively known as bugs. The metamorphosis is incomplete, except in the male coccids and related forms. The molt is usually repeated four times, the stage next to the last, preceding the imago, being called pupa. There are four, or two, or no wings in different cases, and rarely halteres. The thoracic segments are either free or fused. The head is free or broadly united to the thorax, with or without faceted eyes. The essential characters of the order are found in the mouth-parts and associated modifications of the head and sternum, and in the wings. The mouth-organs are usually suctorial, the sucking-tube or haustellum being composed (in the higher forms) of two lateral half-channels or semicylindric pieces homologous with the labium and labial palpi. Thus the mouth-parts consist of a jointed tapering tube, arising from the front of the under side of the head, and inclosing four stiff bristles, which replace the mandibles and maxillae, this whole rostrum being adapted both for piercing and for sucking. There is no sucking-stomach. The modifications of the sternum are such as fit it to support the head and characteristic rostrum. In the largest group of Hemiptera the wings are thick and leathery at the base and membranous at the end. The tarsi are generally three- or two-jointed, rarely having only one joint. Most hemipterous insects feed on plant-juices or the blood of insects or animals, including man, but a few live on the moisture which collects under decaying bark, and certain of the higher forms subsist indifferently upon sap or blood. The Hemiptera have more than once been separated into several different orders, but most entomologists continue to accept the order in its original broad sense, dividing it into several suborders. Three of these universally recognized are Heteroptera, the true bugs; Homoptera, the bark-lice, plant-lice, scale-insects, leafhoppers, cicadas, etc.; and Parasita, the true lice. About 27,000 species are catalogued, and it is estimated that at least 50,000 exist. The Hemiptera thus outnumber far the Orthoptera and Neuroptera, and possibly the Lepidoptera. Formerly also called Rymnoga, Siphonata, and Dermaptera (in part).

Hemipteral (hē-mip'tē-ral), a. Same as hemipterous.

hemipteran (hē-mip'tē-ran), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or characteristic of the Hemiptera: as, "the Hemipteran mouth," Huxley.

II. n. One of the Hemiptera.

That terrible microscopic hemipteran, the chinch-bug.

Pop. Sci. Mo., Aug., 1878, p. 512.

hemipterist (hē-mip'tē-ris-t), n. [< Hemiptera + -ist.] One who studies or collects the Hemiptera.

hemipteron (hē-mip'tē-ron), n. [NL., sing. of Hemiptera.] One of the Hemiptera.

I noticed a singular case of ants milking a winged Hemipteron, which of course could not be kept in captivity, as they do many species of the wingless aphides.

H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 251.

hemipterous (hē-mip'tē-rus), a. [< NL. hemipterus, half-winged, < Gr. ἡμι, half, + πτερόν, wing.] Half-winged—that is, having the fore wings partly membranous and partly coriaceous or chitinous; specifically, of or pertaining to or having the characters of the Hemiptera; found in or characterizing the Hemiptera. Also hemipteral.

hemipyramidal (hem-i-pir'ā-mid), n. [< hemi + pyramid.] In crystal., a pyramid in the monoclinic system (see pyramid): so called because it embraces in a given case only four planes instead of eight. Corresponding forms are distinguished as minus or plus, according as they lie opposite the obtuse or the acute axial angle.

hemipyramidal (hem-i-pi-ram'i-dal), a. [< hemipyramid + -al.] Of or pertaining to a hemipyramid.

Hemirhamphinae (hem-i-ram-fi'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hemirhamphus + -inae.] A subfamily of syngnathous fishes, of the family Scomberesocidae (or Esocidae), typified by the genus Hemirhamphus; the halfbills; so called from the shortness of the upper jaw in comparison with the great length of the spear-like under jaw. These fishes are of slender, straight form, with moderate dorsal and anal fins. There are numerous species, of several genera, some of them viviparous. They are nearly related to the flying-fishes. See cut at halfbeak.

Hemirhamphine (hem-i-ram'fin), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hemirhamphinae.

II. n. A halfbill or halfbeak; one of the Hemirhamphinae.

Hemirhamphus (hem-i-ram'fus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι, half, + ῥάμφος, bill, snout.] A genus of fishes, of the family Scomberesocidae, giving name to the subfamily Hemirhamphinae; the halfbeaks. H. unifasciatus is a common representative on the Atlantic coast of the United States, of some value as a food-fish; there are several others. Usually written Hemiramphus. Cuvier, 1817. See cut under halfbeak.

hemisect (hem-i-sekt), v. t. [< Gr. ἡμι, half, + L. sectus, pp. of sectare, cut: see sectant, section.] To bisect; especially, to bisect longitudinally, or in equal right and left parts.

A hemisected skeleton [of a vertebrate], showing the variation in size of the neural and hemal cavities.

Science, VI. 223.

A hemisection of the whole body. Science, VI. 223.

hemisepala. Plural of hemisepalum.

hemisepal (hem-i-sep'al), a. [< hemisepalum + -al.] Pertaining to a hemisepalum.

hemisepalum (hem-i-sep'alum), n.; pl. hemisepala (-tā). [NL., < L. hemi, half, + sepalum, sepalum, a partition.] In anat., the lateral half of a partition; the right or left part of a longitudinal septum, as that in the heart and brain.—Hemisepalum auriculare, the lateral half of the partition between the auricles of the heart.—Hemisepalum cerebri, the lateral half of the septum lucidum of the brain.—Hemisepalum ventriculare, the lateral half of the partition between the ventricles of the heart.

hemisome (hem-i-sōm), n. [< Gr. ἡμι, half, + σῶμα, body.] One half of an animal's body.

The permanent retention of the radials in the abactinal hemisome of the body of Amphibia.

P. H. Carpenter, Micros. Science, XXVIII. 304.

hemispasm (hem-i-spazm), n. [< Gr. ἡμι, half, + σπασμός, spasm.] Spasm of one lateral half of the body.

hemisphere (hem-i-sfēr), n. [ME. hemyspherie, hemisphere, etc.; in mod. E. according to the L.; = F. hemisphere = Sp. hemisferio = Pg. hemisferio = It. hemisferio, < L. hemisphaerium, < Gr. ἡμισφαῖον, a hemisphere, < ἡμι, half, + σφαῖρα, a sphere.] 1. A half-sphere; one half of a sphere or globe formed by a plane passing through the center. Specifically—2. Half of the terrestrial globe; also, half of the celestial globe, or of the surface of the heavens.

Night with his mantle, that is dark and rude, Gan overspread the hemisphere about.

Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 555.

Sterre is there none in all our empire: Under whose sight I gyne on November.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. T. S.), p. 206.

The hemisphere of earth, in clearest ken, Stretch'd out to the amplest reach of prospect lay.

Milton, P. L., xl. 379.

3. A map or projection of half of the terrestrial or the celestial sphere.—4. In anat., either of the two large convex and convoluted masses, one on each side, which together with the fornix, corpus callosum, thalamencephalon, mesencephalon, and olfactory lobes make up the cerebrum. See brain, cerebrum, and cerebral.—

Eastern and western hemispheres, the eastern and western halves of the terrestrial globe. The former comprises the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and their islands, called the Old World, and the latter the two American continents and their islands, called the New World.—Magdeburg hemispheres, an instrument invented by Otto von Guericke, which illustrates the pressure of the atmosphere. It consists of two hollow brass hemispheres fitting nicely together and furnished with stout handles and with a vent and cock. When the air is exhausted, great force is required to separate the hemispheres.—Northern and southern hemispheres, the halves of the globe north and south of the equator or corresponding divisions of the heavens or celestial globe.

hemispheric (hem-i-sfer'ik), a. [= F. hémisphérique = It. emisferico, < NL. hemisphaericus, < L. hemisphaerium, hemisphere: see hemisphere.] Same as hemispherical.

A pyrites, placed in the cavity of another of an hemispherical figure, in much the same manner as an acorn in its cup. Woodward, Fossils.

hemispherical (hem-i-sfer'ikal), a. [< hemispheric + -al.] Having the form of a hemisphere: as, a hemispherical body.

That we call a fayrie stone, and is often found in gravel-pits amongst us, being of an hemispherical figure, hath five double lines arising from the center of its basis, which, if no accretion distract them, do commonly concur and meet in the pole thereof. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err. ii. 1.

I saw a pedestal of the earthy trachyte, covered by a hemispherical portion of a vein, like a great umbrella, sufficiently large to shelter two persons.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, i. 52.

hemispheroid (hem-i-sfēr'oid), n. [< hemi + spheroid.] A solid whose figure is approximately but not exactly that of a hemisphere.

hemispheroidal (hem'i-sfēr-oi'dal), a. [< hemispheroid + -al.] Having the form of a hemispheroid.

For the minuter examination of the corneales, . . . these must be separated from the hemispheroidal mass. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 627.

hemispherule (hem-i-sfēr'ül), n. [< hemi + spherule, q. v.] A half-spherule.

hemistich (hem-i-stik'), n. [< L. hemistichium, < Gr. ἡμιστίχιον, a half-line, < ἡμι, half, + στίχος, a row, line, verse. Cf. distich, acrostich, etc.] In pros.: (a) The exact or approximate half of a line or verse; one of the two commata or sections of a line divided by the cesura or dieresis. (b) Any group of words forming part of a line, and considered or cited by itself; an incomplete or unfinished line.

Virgil . . . will rather break off in an hemistich, than that the line should be lazy and languid.

Garth, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., Pref.

(c) A colon, comma, or group of feet of less extent than the average line, or than the other lines of the same poem or stanza, standing metrically by itself, or so written, as, for example, an epodic line, ephymnium, or refrain.

hemistichal (hem-i-stik'al), a. [< hemistich + -al.] Pertaining to or constituting a hemistich or hemistiches: as, a hemistichal colon or line; a hemistichal division of a verse.

The reader will observe the constant return of the hemistichal point, which I have been careful to preserve and to represent with exactness.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, I, Additions.

hemisymmetry (hem-i-sim'e-tri), n. [< Gr. ἡμι-, half, + συμμετρία, symmetry.] Same as hemihedrisism.

Hemitelia (hem-i-tē'li-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμιτελής, half-finished, < ἡμι, half, + τέλος, end.] A genus of tree-ferns, of the suborder Polypodiaceae, with large pinnate or decomposed fronds. The sori are solitary, globose, situated below the apex of a lateral vein or veinlet, generally near the margin. About 20 species are known, all natives of the tropics, and mostly of South America. H. Brunoniana, of the mountainous districts of India, is a handsome fern, often attaining a height of 40 feet. H. Smithii, Smith's tree-fern, of New Zealand, is a hardy species adapted to cultivation. Sometimes incorrectly written Hemithelia. Robert Brown, 1810.

Hemitelia (hem'i-tē-li'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hemitelia + -ae.] A division of the polypodiaceous ferns of the tribe Cyathea, established by Presl in 1839, and typified by the genus Hemitelia.

hemitone (hem-i-tōn), n. [< Gr. ἡμιτόνον, a half-tone, < ἡμι, half, + τόνος, a tone.] In music, the interval of a half-tone; a perfect fourth less two tones, represented by the ratio 256:243: not exactly equivalent to a modern semitone.

hemitrichous (hē-mit'ri-kus), a. [< Gr. ἡμι-, half, + τριχ-, hair.] In bot., half covered with hairs. [Not used.]

Hemitriptera (hem'i-trip-ter'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hemitripterus + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, represented by the genus Hemitripterus alone. It embraces Cottoidea with a dorsal fin consisting of a very long acanthopterous and short arthopterous portion, incomplete subocular or thoracic ventrals with one spine and three soft rays, inflated head with prominent orbits, branchial apertures confluent, but with the branchial membrane broad and continuous below, the trunk antiform, and the vertebrae numerous (for example, 16 abdominal + 23 caudal).

Hemitripterus (hem-i-trip'te-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἡμι, half, + τρεῖς (trōi-), = E. three, + πτερόν, wing, fin, = E. feather.] The typical genus of the family Hemitriptera.

hemitropical (hem-i-trō-pal), a. [As hemitrope + -al.] Same as hemitropous.

hemitrope (hem-i-trōp), a. and n. [< Gr. ἡμι-, half, + τροπή, a turning.] I. A Half-turned: specifically applied in mineralogy to a compound or twin crystal which has two similar parts or halves, one of which is turned half round upon the other.

II. n. 1. Anything that is hemitropous in structure.—2. A twin crystal.

hemitropic (hem-i-trōp'ik), a. [As hemitrope + -ic.] Half-turned; hemitropous.

In a good deal of the felspar, however, the edges of the hemitropic lamellae are too blurred to allow the exact angles to be taken.

F. W. Rudler, Geol. Mag., N. S., III, Dec. iii. 267.

hemitropous (hē-mit'rō-pus), a. [As hemitrope + -ous.] Turned half round; half-inverted:

specifically applied in botany to an ovule in which the axis of the nucleus is more curved than in an anatropous ovule. Also hemitropical.

hemitropy (hem'i-trō-pi), n. [As hemitrope + -y.] Twin composition in crystals.

hemitype (hem'i-tip), n. [< Gr. ἡμι-, half, + τύπος, impression (type).] That which is hemitypic.

hemitypic (hem-i-tip'ik), a. [As hemitype + -ic.] In zool., only partly typical of a given group, in consequence of part-taking of the characters of some other group. Thus, a hemitypic bird is one which, as those of the genus Archaeopteryx, shares many characters of the reptilian type, and by so much departs from the avian type.

hemlock (hem'lok), n. [< ME. hemlok, also written humlok, humloke, homelok, irreg. < AS. hemic, hymelic (gen. hemicles), also hymlice (gen. hymlican), oldest form hymblisce, hemlock; appar. < hem-, hym-, of unknown origin, + -lic, -lice, a termination supposed to be identical with that in AS. cerlic, E. charlock, and late AS. barlic, E. barley: see barley.] 1. A poisonous plant, Conium maculatum, of the natural order Umbelliferae. It is a tall, erect, branching biennial, with a smooth, shining, hollow stem (usually marked with purplish spots), elegant much-divided leaves, and white flowers in compound umbels of ten or more rays, surrounded by a general involucre of from three to seven leaflets. It is found throughout Europe and temperate Asia in waste places, on banks, and under walls. It is said to be fatal to cows, while horses, goats, and sheep may feed upon it without danger. The poison administered to Socrates, and in common use for the execution of criminals in ancient Athens, is supposed to have been a decoction of it, though some think that this potion was obtained from water-hemlock (Cicuta virosa). Hemlock is a powerful sedative, and is used medicinally. The extract is considered the best preparation. It is often serviceable as a substitute for or an accompaniment to opium. It has been found very useful in chronic rheumatism and in whooping-cough, and in allaying the pain of irritable sores and cancerous ulcers.

Flowering Umbels and Leaves of Hemlock (Conium maculatum). a, flower; b, fruit; c, hemlock cut transversely.

The virtues of hemlock reside in an alkaline principle termed conine or conia, which is most abundant in the fruit and seeds. See conine.

Round about the caldron go;
In the poison'd entrails throw;
Root of hemlock digg'd i' the dark.

Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1.

As touching hemlocke, it is also a ranke poyson, witness the publike ordinance and law of the Athenians, whereby malefactors who have deserved to die were forced to drinke that odious potion of hemlocke.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxv. 18.

Beneath an emerald plane
Sits Diotima, teaching him that died
Of hemlock.

Tennyson, Princess, III.

2. The hemlock-spruce.—Hemlock stork's-bill, the stork's-bill, Erodium cicutarium: so named because the dissected leaves resemble those of the hemlock.

hemlock-droptwort (hem'lok-drop'wört), n. See Enanthe.

Hemlock-parasley (hem'lok-pär'sli), n. An umbelliferous plant, of two species, Conioselinum Fischeri and C. Canadense, resembling hemlock, but not poisonous.

hemlock-pitch (hem'lok-pich), n. A pitch obtained from the hemlock-spruce, Picea Canadensis of the apothecaries.

Hemlock-spruce (hem'lok-sprös), n. An American fir, the Tsuga Canadensis: so called from the resemblance of its branches in tenacity and position to the leaves of the common hemlock, Conium maculatum: commonly called simply hemlock. The bark is much used in tanning; combined with that of oak, it is thought to make the best leather. Leather tanned with the bark of hemlock alone has a red color, and is inferior. The Californian hemlock is Tsuga Mertensiana; that of the Southern States is T. Caroliniana. The ground-hemlock is the dwarf yew of eastern North America (Taxus baccata, var. Canadensis), a straggling bush with flat distichous leaves resembling those of the hemlock-spruce.

hemmel (hem'l), n. A Scotch form of hemble.
hemmer (hem'er), n. [< heml, v., + -er.] One who or that which hems; specifically, an attachment or adjunct to a sewing-machine by means of which a hem is made.

hemming (hem'ing), n. [Verbal n. of heml, v.]

1. The process of making a hem, as in sewing a garment.—2. The stitch by which a hem is secured; the doubled edge of a fabric hemmed down to the fabric itself; collectively, the hem or hems: as, the hemming was decorated with embroidery.—German hemming, a method of uniting two pieces of textile material in which the raw edges of both are turned down together, and the fold so produced is sewed to the piece of stuff, against which it comes as in ordinary hemming.

hemming, himming (hem', him'ing), n. [< ME. héminge, < AS. hemming (once in a gloss), a rough shoe: cf. Icel. hemingr, hömungr, the skin of the shanks of a hide: see under humble.] A shoe or sandal made of rawhide. Simmonds.

hemo- See hemato-.

hemocœle, hæmocœle (hem'ō-sēl), n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + κοῖλη, the large cavity of the body.] The general body-cavity or vascular tract of arthropods and mollusks, analogous to the coeloma of a vertebrate.

The main vascular tracts, therefore, are five in number, or, to put it in another way, the hæmocœle is divided into five main chambers. Jour. of Micros. Science, XXVIII. 384.

hemocyanin, hæmocyanin (hem'ō-si'g-nin), n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + κυανός, blue, + -in.] The coloring matter of the blood of various invertebrates. It contains copper. It is blue when oxidized, and colorless in the deoxidized state.

hemodrometer, hæmodrometer (hem'ō-drom'ē-ter), n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + δρόμος, course, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument used to measure the velocity of the movement of the blood.

hemodromograph, hæmodromograph (hem'ō-drom'ō-grāf), n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + δρόμος, a running, course, + γράφειν, write.] A self-registering instrument which records the velocity of the blood.

hemodromometer, hæmodromometer (hem'ō-drom'om'ē-ter), n. Same as hemodrometer.
Hemogastric (hem'ō-gas'trik), a. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + E. gastric.] Pertaining to the blood and the stomach.—Hemogastric fever. See fever.

Hemoglobin, hæmoglobin (hem'ō-glō'bīn), n. [< Gr. αἷμα, blood, + L. globus, a ball, + -in.] The red substance, which forms about nine tenths of the dry constituents of the red blood-corpuscles and serves as the carrier of oxygen in the circulation. It is crystallizable, and can be resolved into hematin and a proteid residue. It has the property of combining loosely with oxygen, and this compound is called oxyhemoglobin, while physiologists reserve hemoglobin for the deoxidized substance. Also called hemoglobulin, hematoglobulin, hematoglobulin, hematoerythralin, chromatin, and erythrin.

hemoglobinemia, hæmoglobinemia (hem'ō-glō-bi-nē'mī-ä), n. [NL. hemoglobinemia, < hemoglobin, q. v., + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., the presence of free hemoglobin in the plasma of the blood.

hemoglobiferous, hæmoglobiferous (hem-glo-bi-nif'ë-rus), a. [Gr. hæmoglobin + L. ferre = E. bear.] Containing hemoglobin.

Whether in the Hoplonemertines, where the blood fluid is often provided with hæmoglobiferous disks, the chief function of the side organs may not rather be a sensory one must be further investigated.

Encyc. Brit., XVII. 329.

hemoglobinometer, hæmoglobinometer (hem-glo-bi-nom'ë-tër), n. [Gr. hæmoglobin + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the amount of hemoglobin in the blood. Also hematinometer, hæmatinometer.

hemoglobinuria, hæmoglobinuria (hem-glo-bi-nū'ri-ä), n. [NL. hæmoglobinuria, Gr. hæmoglobin + Gr. οὖρον, urine.] In pathol., the presence of free hemoglobin in the urine.

hemoglobulin, hæmoglobulin (hem-glob'ü-lin), n. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + L. globulus, a globe, + -in.] Same as hemoglobin.

hemolymph, hæmolymp (hem'ö-limf), n. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + E. lymph, q. v.] The nutritive fluid, comparable to blood or lymph, which occupies the body-cavity of some invertebrates, as polyzoa.

In Eupulzoa (excepting the Entoprocta) the coelom is very capacious; it is occupied by a coagulable hæmolymp in which float cellular corpuscles.

E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 432.

hemolymphatic, hæmolympathic (hem'ö-lim-fat'ik), a. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + lymphatic.] Pertaining to blood and to lymph; noting a circulatory or vascular system which is not differentiated into separate blood-vascular and lymphatic systems.

hemolytic, hæmolytic (hem'ö-lit'ik), a. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + λυτικός, able to loose, Gr. λύω, loosen.] Destructive of the blood, especially of the blood-corpuscles.

hemometer, hæmometer (hë-mom'ë-tër), n. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + μέτρον, a measure.] Same as hemodynamometer.

hemopericardium, hæmopericardium (hem-gë-per-i-kär'di-um), n. Same as hematopericardium.

hemophilia, hæmophilia (hem-ö-fil'i-ä), n. [NL. hæmophilia, Gr. αἷμα, blood, + φίλος, loving.] In pathol., a congenital morbid condition characterized by a tendency to bleed immoderately from any insignificant wound, or even spontaneously. Also called hematophilia, hæmorrhaphilia, and hemorrhagic diathesis.

hemophilic, hæmophilic (hem-ö-fil'ik), a. [Gr. hæmophilia, Gr. αἷμα, blood, + -ic.] Having a tendency to spontaneous bleeding.

hemophthalmia, hæmophthalmia (hem-of-thal'mi-ä), n. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ὀφθαλμός, eye: see ophthalmia.] Effusion of blood into the eye.

hemoptic, hæmoptic (hë-mop'tik), a. Same as hemoptysical.

hemoptysical, hæmoptysical (hem-op-tiz'ik-ä), a. [Gr. hæmoptysis, hemoptys-is, + -ic-al.] In pathol., affected with or pertaining to hemoptysis.

hemoptysis, hæmoptysis (hë-mop'ti-sis), n. [NL. hæmoptysis, Gr. αἷμα, blood, + πύσις, a spitting, Gr. πύω, spit.] In pathol., spitting of blood: usually restricted to the raising of blood from the lungs. Also hæmoptöe.

hemorrhage, hæmorrhage (hem'ö-rä-j), n. [= F. hémorragie = Sp. hemorragia = Pg. hemorragia = It. emorragia, L. hæmorrhagia, Gr. αἱμορραγία, a violent bleeding (esp., according to Galen, from the nose), Gr. αἱμορραγία, bleeding violently, Gr. αἷμα, blood, + -ραγία, Gr. ῥήγναι, break, burst, = L. frangere = E. break.] A discharge of blood from blood-vessels: usually applied to flux, either external or internal, from a vessel or vessels ruptured by disease or by a wound, and constituting, when considerable and unchecked, an immediate danger to life.—Bronchial hemorrhage. Same as bronchæmorrhage. hemorrhagic, hæmorrhagic (hem'ö-rä-j'ik), a. [Gr. hæmorrhage, Gr. αἱμορραγία, + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or exhibiting hemorrhage.—Hemorrhagic diathesis, a constitutional tendency to profuse hemorrhage from slight causes.—Hemorrhagic fever. See fever.

hemorrhagy, hæmorrhagy (hem'ö-rä-j), n. [L. hæmorrhagia: see hemorrhage.] Hemorrhage.

That the maternal blood flows most copiously to the placenta uterina in women, is manifest from the great hæmorrhagy that succeeds the separation thereof at the birth.

Ray, Works of Creation, I.

hemorrhaphilia, hæmorrhaphilia (hem'ö-rä-fil'i-ä), n. [NL. hæmorrhaphilia, Gr. αἱμορραγία, a violent bleeding, + -φιλία, a love, = E. philia.] A morbid condition of the blood, characterized by a tendency to bleed immoderately from any insignificant wound, or even spontaneously. Also called hematophilia, hæmorrhaphilia, and hemorrhagic diathesis.

(γία), hemorrhage, + φίλος, loving.] Same as hemophilia.

hemorrhoid, hæmorrhoid (hem'ö-roid), n. [In earlier E. form emoroid (see emoroid); = F. hemorrhoides = Sp. hemorroide, hemorroïda = Pg. hemorrhoida = It. emorroide = G. hæmorrhoida = Dan. Sw. hemorroide, L. hæmorrhoida (fem. sing.), Gr. αἱμορροΐς, pl. αἱμορροΐδες (sc. φλέβες, veins), veins liable to discharge blood, esp. piles, Gr. αἱμορροΐς, flowing with blood, Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ῥόος, a flow, flux, Gr. ῥέω, flow.] A tumor in the anal region, either within the anus (internal hemorrhoid) or without (external hemorrhoid), formed of dilated blood-vessels with more or less hyperplastic growth of connective tissue. See piles.

hemorrhoid, hæmorrhoid (hem'ö-roid), n. [L. hæmorrhoides (-id-), Gr. αἱμορροΐς (-id-), also αἱμορροΐς, a serpent (see def.), Gr. αἱμορροΐς, flowing with blood: see hemorrhoid.] In anc. zoöl. (Pliny), a venomous serpent the bite of which was said to make blood flow from all parts of the body.

hemorrhoidal, hæmorrhoidal (hem'ö-roi'dal), a. [Gr. hæmorrhoid, Gr. αἱμορροΐς, + -al.] Pertaining to, affected with, or caused by hemorrhoids: as, a hemorrhoidal tumor or flux; a hemorrhoidal patient, vein, or artery.

hemosalpinx, hæmosalpinx (hem-ö-sal'pinks), n. Same as hematosalpinx.

hemospastic, hæmospastic (hem-ö-spas'tik), a. and n. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + σπάζω, draw.]

I. a. Drawing or attracting blood to a part, as a cupping-glass.

II. n. Something which has this property or action.

hemostasia, hæmostasia (hem-ö-stä'si-ä), n. [NL. hæmostasia, Gr. αἷμα, blood, + στάσις, a standing.] In pathol., stagnation of blood in a part; also, any operation for arresting the flow of blood, as the ligation of an artery.

hemostatic, hæmostatic (hem-ö-stat'ik), a. and n. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + στατικός, Gr. ἵσταναι, cause to stand: see static.] I. a. Stopping or preventing hemorrhage; styptic.

Ergot and digitalis, and probably also the acetate of lead, exert their hæmostatic action by causing a contraction of the arterioles. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 477.

II. n. A medicine designed to stop hemorrhage; a styptic.

hemothorax, hæmothorax (hem-ö-tho'raks), n. Same as hematothorax.

hemotrophy, hæmotrophy (hë-mot'rö-fy), n. [Gr. αἷμα, blood, + τροφή, nourishment.] Excessive hematopoiesis.

hemp (hemp), n. [ME. hemp, contr. and assimilated (like hammer > hanaper) < AS. hænep, hænep = D. hennep = MLG. hennep = OHG. hanaf, hanof, MHG. hanef, hanf, G. hanf = Icel. hamp, hanof, Sw. hampa = Dan. hamp (Goth. not recorded) = Gr. κάνναβις (> L. cannabis, > It. canape = Sp. cáñamo = Pg. canhamo, canamo = Fr. canbe, cambre = F. chanvre, dial. canve, chambe, cambe = (prob.) Ir. canab, cnab = Bret. canib = Ar. Pers. qinnab) = OBulg. konoplya = Serv. konoplje = Bohem. konope = Pol. konop = Russ. konoplya, konopelt, konop = OPruss. konapios = Lith. kanapes = Lett. kanepes, hemp. The Rom., Ar., etc., forms are from the L., the L. from the Gr., and the Gr., Teut., and Slav. forms are supposed to be independently derived from an ancient "Scythian" or Caspian source. The Skt. çana, hemp, appears to be connected. From the L. cannabis come ult. E. canvas, canvass, cannabie, cannabine, etc.] 1. A plant of the genus Cannabis, natural order Urticaceæ, of which C. sativa is the only known species, C. Indica being only a variety. It is an annual herbaceous plant, the fiber of which constitutes the hemp of commerce. It is a native of western and central Asia, but has been long naturalized in Brazil and tropical Africa, and is extensively cultivated in many countries. The Indian variety, often called Cannabis Indica, is the source of the narcotic drug bang or hashish. (See bang.) A valuable oil is expressed from the seeds.

Heer fatal Hemp, which Denmark doth afford,

Doth furnish vs with Canvass, and with Cord.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 3.

Hemp when required for cordage is generally shown in drills, when for weaving purposes it is scattered broadcast.

A. G. F. Eliot James, Indian Industries, p. 142.

2. The fiber of this plant, obtained from the skin or rind by rotting the stalks under moisture, and prepared by various processes for manufacturing uses. It is tough and strong, and peculiarly adapted for weaving into coarse fabrics such as sail-cloth, and twisting into ropes and cables. As the ordinary material of ropes used for hanging, it is the subject of humorous allusion.

What, you speak of Hempe? marry, you terme it with manie prettie names. I neuer heard the like termes giuen to any simple, as you giue to this; you call it neckweede.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 240.

Let gallows gape for dog, let man go free,

And let not hemp his windpipe suffocate.

Shak., Hen. V., iii. 6.

3. One of various plants of other genera yielding similar fibers, distinguished by specific epithets.—African hemp. See Sansevieria.—Bastard hemp. Daticca cannabina, a plant allied to the Cactaceæ, a native of Asia Minor and Crete.—Bengal, Bombay, Madras, or Sunn hemp. Crotalaria juncea, a papilionaceous shrub, a native of those countries.—Bowstring hemp. (a) See Sansevieria. (b) Calotropis gigantea (Asclepiadaceæ): same as nadar.—Brown Indian hemp. Hibiscus cannabifera, a plant of the mallow family.—Holy hemp. See holy.—Indian hemp. (a) Cannabis Indica. (b) Apocynum cannabinum.—Apocynum.—Jubbulpore hemp. Crotalaria tenuifolia, a leguminous plant.—Manila hemp. a fibrous material obtained from the Musa textilis. See manila and Musa.—Ramie hemp. Same as ramie.—Sisal hemp. the fiber of species of Agave, especially A. latifolia. See henequen.—Virginian hemp, or water-hemp. Acrida cannabina, an amarantaceous plant, a native of the eastern United States near the coast, growing in marshes and along the banks of rivers.

hemp-agrimony (hemp'ä-gri-mö-ni), n. A plant of the genus Eupatorium, especially E. cannabinum, which has a wide distribution and is often cultivated. See Eupatorium.—Bastard hemp-agrimony. Ageratum conyzoides, a plant found in most tropical and subtropical countries.

hemp-brake (hemp'bräk), n. 1. A machine in which the fiber is separated by beating from rotted and subsequently dried hemp-stalks. Also hemp-break.

The common hemp-break will clean two hundred pounds per day.

New Amer. Farm Book, p. 252.

2. In her., same as bray, 2 (b).

hemp-bray (hemp'brä), n. In her., same as bray, 2 (b).

hemp-bush (hemp'bush), n. A malvaceous plant, Plantaginthus pulchellus, native of Australia and New Zealand, where it is also cultivated. See Plantaginthus. Sometimes called the Victorian hemp-bush.

hempen (hemp'pn), a. [ME. hampen (= D. hennep = OHG. hanafin, MHG. hānfin, G. hānfen); < hemp + -en.] 1. Made of hemp; pertaining to hemp, or (by allusion) to a rope.

About his neck an hempen rope he wears.

Spenser, F. Q., I. ix. 22.

With hempen cord it's better

To stop each poor man's breath.

Lord Delaware (Child's Ballads, VII. 314).

So many lamentable hemp Tragedies (hangings) acted at Tiburne.

Dekker, Seven Deadly Sins, p. 44.

2. Resembling hemp; fibrous. [Rare.]

The former of these are made of the bark of a pine-tree beat into a hempen state.

Cook, Voyages, IX. iv. 3.

Hempen caudlet, a hangman's noose: in allusion to a caudle or warm drink taken just before going to bed.

Ye shall have a hempen caudle then, and the pap of hatchet.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 7.

Hempen collar, the noose of the hangman's rope placed round the neck.—Hempen widow, the widow of a man who has been hanged. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

hempie (hemp'pi), a. and n. See hempy. [Scotch.]

hemp-nettle (hemp'net'l), n. A coarse, bristly annual weed, Galeopsis Tetrahit, of the labiate family, resembling hemp somewhat in appearance, the stiff hairs reminding one of the nettle.

It is common throughout Europe, and introduced into the northern United States. Also called hemp dead-nettle.

hemp-palm (hemp'pām), n. The dwarf palm or palmetto, Chamærops humilis, of the Mediterranean region; also, the palmetto of China and Japan, generally known as Chamærops excelsa, now called Trachycarpus. Both of these plants yield a fiber of commercial value.

Male (a) and Female (b) Plants of Hemp (Cannabis sativa).
a, male flower; b, female flower; c, embryo.

hemp-resin (hemp' rez'in), n. The resinous narcotic product of the hemp as it grows in India: same as churru.

hemp-seed (hemp'séd), n. The seed of hemp. It is used as food for birds, and also yields an oil suitable for various purposes.

In the same were four Turtle Doves, and many gold Finches, with other birds which are such as our hempseeds birds in England. Coryat, Crudities, I. 19.

[In the following passage hemp-seed is usually supposed to be an intended blunder for homicide.]

Do, do, thou rogue! do, thou hemp-seed!
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 1.

To have hemp-seed sown for one, to be destined for the gallows. [Colloq.]

hempstring (hemp'string), n. One who deserves or is likely to be hanged; a crack-hemp.

Vau. A perfect young hempstring!
Van. Peace, least he overhere you.
Chapman, Monsieur D'Olive, v. 1.

henbane (hen'bān), n. [< ME. henbane, hennebane (> F. hanebane). (cf. Dan. hōnebane = Sw. hōnsbane) = < hen¹ + bane¹.] The AS. name was henne-belle, heenne-belle, lit. 'hen-bell.' A plant of the genus Hyoscyamus, natural order Solanaceæ. Common henbane is H. niger, a native of Europe and northern Asia, and adventitious in the United States.

Henbane (Hyoscyamus niger). a, fruit; b, capsule, cut transversely.

It is a coarse, erect biennial herb, found in waste ground and loose dry soil, having soft, clammy, hairy foliage of a disagreeable odor, pale yellowish-brown flowers streaked with purple veins, and a five-toothed calyx. The leaves are used in medicine, and resemble belladonna in their action. They yield hyoscyne and hyoscyamine. When taken in any considerable quantity, the herb acts as a deadly poison to man and most animals, and is especially destructive to domestic fowls (whence the name). Swine are said to eat it with impunity. Also called stinking nightshade and hog's-bean.

That to which old Socrates was curst,
Or henbane juice, to swell 'em till they burst.
Dryden.

The henbane or insane-root, which the Gauls used for their poisoned arrows.

henchman (hench'man), n.; pl. henchmen (-men). [Early mod. E. also henchman, henseman, henzman, hansman, haunsman (as a surname existing in the forms Henchman, Hensman, Hinchman, Hincksman, Hinxman), < late ME. henshman, henshman, hensman, heynsman, henzman, a groom, a page or attendant, prob. contr. from hengest-mann*, lit. 'horse-man,' i. e. groom (= G. hengstmann = Icel. hestamadr, a groom); < ME. hengest, a horse, recorded but once, namely, as hengest, in Layamon, l. 3546 (about A. D. 1200), but prob. surviving much later, or renewed in the compound through Scand. influence, < AS. hengest, hengst, a horse, steed (also in compound local names, as Hengestes-bróc, now Hinzbrook, Hengestesgeat, now Hinzgate, Hengestesrige (for Hengestesrige*), now Henstridge, = OFries. hengst = D. hengst = OHG. hengist, MHG. hengest, G. hengst, a horse (in OHG. also a gelding) (> ODan. hengst, Dan. Sw. hingst, a horse, stallion: the Scand. forms being prop. contracted and the sense more general), = Dan. hest = Sw. häst = Icel. hest, a horse (Goth. not recorded), + man. For the sense, cf. Icel. hestvörðr (lit. 'horse-ward'), a mounted guard, Sw. hingstridare (lit. 'horse-rider'), a groom of the king's stable who rides before his coach, a forespurrier, a jockey (= MHG. hengestritter, a rider); so the OHG. forms repr. by ML. hengistfuster, a groom (lit. 'horse-feeder': see foster), and hengistnotus, a groom (OHG. nôt, need). The usual explanation of henshman as 'haunchman,' an invented compound defined as 'a man who stands at one's haunch,' is erroneous.] 1. A groom; a footman; a male attendant; a follower. [Archaic.]

Twenty-five years ago, if you spoke to an American of a Henchman, he would have understood that you were making an historical allusion. . . . At this moment, however, the term designates a very familiar figure in American politics. . . . The Henchman is, in fact, a necessity of what is called machine politics, or in plainer language, of the present mode of getting and keeping high office. . . . It is the Henchman who corresponds with the chief, and goes on to Washington or elsewhere to see him when any emergency arises. The Nation, XXX. 398.

hen-clam (hen'klam), n. [So called as being mistaken for the hen or female of some other kind of clam.] 1. The sea-clam, Macra or Spisula solidissima, of the Atlantic coast of North America. The flesh is edible, and much used for soups and chowders; the large deep shells are used for various domestic purposes, as for scoops, skimmers, etc.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1228.

hendelyt, adv. See hendly.

hendiadys (hen-di'a-dis), n. [NL., also hendiadis; < Gr. ἐν δὲ δύοιν, one by two: ἐν, neut. of ēis, one; δύο, prep., by, through (see dia); δύοιν, gen. dual of δύο = E. two.] In rhet., a figure which consists in using two words connected by a copulative conjunction to express a single complex idea; especially, substitution of two substantives so coördinated for a substantive with its attributive adjective or limiting genitive. Thus Virgil (Georgics ii. 192) says 'pateris libamus et auro, we pour out (wine) in libation from pateris and gold—that is, 'from golden pateris.' Cicero (II. Ver. v. xiv. 38) speaks of 'jus imaginis ad memoriam posteritatemque prodenda, the right of transmitting one's portrait to memory and posterity, for' to the memory of posterity. Verbs can be used in the same way: as, 'fuisti fugavique, he was to be overthrown and put to flight—that is, to be utterly routed.

hendlyt, a. [ME. hendlic, hendelich; < hend² + -lyt.] Same as hend², 3 and 4. Layamon.

hendlyt, adv. [ME. hendly, hendely, hendeli, hendlich, hendeliche, hendely, hendly, etc.; < hend² + -lyt.] Conveniently; easily; skillfully; cleverly; courteously; graciously.

I kneld & pulld the brere me fro.

And redde this word ful hendeli.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 91.

hendness, n. [ME. also hendness; < hend², a., + -ness.] Civility; courtesy.

hen-driver (hen'dri'vēr), n. A kind of hawk, perhaps the same as hen-harrier. I. Walton.

hendy (hen'di), a. [< ME. hend, hendy, var. of hende: see hend². Cf. handy.] Same as hend².

So loveth she this hendy Nicholas.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 3386.

And he is curteys and hendy,
Thi God him lete wel endy.

MS. Coll. Jes. Ozon., I. (Halliwell.)

henet, v. t. [ME. henen, < AS. hānan, stone, < hān, a stone; see *hone*¹.] To stone; to throw stones at.

Our Givens [Jews] him ladde withouth [the] toun, and henede him with stones,
And to stronge [dethe] him brogte inoung.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 40.

henent, adv. See hen².

henequen, henequin (hen'ē-ken, -kin), n. [Also heniquin; < Sp. jeniquen or geniquen.] A fiber known as Sisal hemp, obtained principally from Agave Irtii of Yucatan; also, the plant itself. Undoubtedly several species of Agave furnish this fiber, but they have been so long in cultivation that it is difficult or impossible to identify them. These plants yield a return of leaves when four or five years old, and with proper management may last as long as fifty or sixty years. The fiber is especially valuable for use in ship's cables, since it resists dampness better than hemp.

henfare (hen'fār), n. [Appar. < ME. henne, hence (see hen²), + fare, fare, going. Skinner has hinefar or heinfar, explaining it as the flight or desertion of a servant (hind).] A fine for flight imposed upon one accused of murder.

hen-fish (hen'fish), n. The pomfret, Brama rayi, a fish of the family Bramidae. [Ireland.] hengi. Middle English present and preterit of hang.

hengel, n. 1. A Middle English form of hinge.—2. The heart, liver, and lights of an animal. Ord. and Reg., p. 96. (Halliwell).—3. See the extract.

The present name (Stonehenge) is Saxon, though the work is beyond all comparison older, signifying an hanging rod or pole, i. e. a Gallows, from the hanging parts, architraves, or rather impostas; and pendulous rocks are still in Yorkshire called Henges.

Dejoe, Tour through Great Britain, I. 305.

hengelt, henglet, n. See hingle.

hengent, n. [AS., prison, confinement (orig. in stocks or pillory), also a cross, gibbet, and abstractly hanging (= OS. hanginna, cross), < hōn, pp. hangen, hang; see hang. Cf. hangwite.] Prison: an Anglo-Saxon word occurring in the (Latin) laws ascribed to Henry I.

hengwite, n. Same as hangwite.

hen-harm (hen'härm), n. The hen-harrier.

hen-harrier (hen'har'ī-er), n. A bird of prey of the genus Circus, especially the European marsh-hawk, C. cyaneus: so named from their depredations in the poultry-yard. See *harrier*², 2, and cut under Circus.

A hen-harrier bore in his talons a chicken to his young.
S. Judy, Margaret, I. 16.

hen-hawk (hen'hák), n. Any hawk that preys upon poultry. Also called chicken-hawk. Specifically—(a) The hen-harrier. (b) The goshawk. (c) Some species of Buteo or buzzard proper, as the red-tailed (B. borealis), the red-shouldered (B. lineatus), the broad-winged (B. pennsylvanicus), and others. See cut under Buteo.—Blue hen-hawk, the adult American goshawk, Astur atricapillus.

hen-heart (hen'härt), n. [ME. henne-harte.] One who has, as it were, the heart of a hen; a chicken-hearted fellow; a coward; a poltroon.

Be the deuyllis nese, ze ar doggedly diseased,
A! henne-harte! ill hadde mot gou hente.

York Plays, p. 326.

hen-hearted (hen'här'ted), a. Timid; cowardly; dastardly; chicken-hearted.

She is hen-hearted, shee dares not looke Truth in the face.
N. Ward, Simple Cobar, p. 74.

One puling hen-hearted rogue is sometimes the ruin of a set.
Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 119.

hen-house (hen'hous), n. A house, coop, or shelter for fowls.

hen-huzzy (hen'huz'i), n. A man who meddles in women's affairs; a cotquean. Halliwell.

Henicuridae (hen-i-kū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Henicurus + -idae.] A family of passerine birds with booted tarsi, long, deeply forked tails, each feather tipped with white, and 10 primaries; the forktails. They have some superficial resemblance to the wagtails of the family Motacillidae. There are only three genera and less than a dozen species, of Asia and lands further east. Also written Enicuridae.

Henicurus (hen-i-kū'rus), n. [NL., also improp. Enicurus (C. J. Temminck, 1838), < Gr. ênikós, single (in zoological use implying 'singular'), + ourá, tail.] 1. In ornith., the typical genus of the family Henicuridae.—2. In entom.: (a) A genus of beetles, of the family Malacodermidae, founded by Stephens in 1830. There are many European and a few South American species. H. hirtus is an example. (b) A genus of flies. Walker.

henkt, n. An obsolete form of ink.

Henlean (hen'lē-an), a. Pertaining to the German anatomist Hénle (1809–85).—Henlean mem- brane, the fenestrated membrane of Henle, the third or outer layer of the inner coat of an artery, consisting of a network of elastic fiber.

hen-mold (hen'möld), n. A kind of black spongy soil.

henna (hen'ā), n. [= F. henné, hinné, < Ar. henna, name of the plant. Cf. alcanna, alkenna, alenna, and alkanet.] 1. The Egyptian privet or flower of Paradise, Lawsonia inermis, of the natural order Lythraceae, a shrub bearing opposite entire leaves and numerous small and fragrant white flowers. It was called by Mohammed "chief of the flowers of this world and the next." It is cultivated extensively in Egypt. The powdered leaves form a large article of export to Persia and the Turkish possessions, where they are used as a dye, and in the form of a paste as a cosmetic. (See def. 2.) They produce a reddish-brown color, and in Europe are employed in dyeing leather. Henna is considered the best hedge-plant in India. 2. A paste made from the leaves of this plant by mixture with catechu, used in the East by women to stain their nails, finger-tips, and eyelids, and by men to dye their beards. The reddish-orange color it imparts is not permanent. It is often deepened to black by the addition of other ingredients.

Branch of Henna (Lawsonia inermis), with flower and fruit.

hennet, adv. A Middle English form of hen².

hennery (hen'er-i), n.; pl. henneries (-iz). [< hen¹ + -ery.] A place where fowls are kept; a poultry-yard.

hennest, hennesforth. Middle English forms of hence, henceforth.

hennin (hen'in), n. [OF.] A head-dress worn by Frenchwomen from 1430 to 1465 or later, high and conical in form, but differing in shape at different times.

henry (hen'i), a. [< hen¹ + -y¹.] Of or pertaining to a hen; particularly, hen-feathered, or feathered like a female in hackle, saddle, tail, and color; said of a cock. This condition is characteristic of the males of some breeds of chickens, as the Sebright bantams.

There is a tendency towards the assumption of the female plumage by the males, and distinct breeds of henry game [fowls] are known.
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 644.

henothism (hen'ō-thē-izm), n. [< Gr. ênō (ên-), one, + θεός, god, + -ism.] A name given to an asserted characteristic of the oldest Hindu religion (of the Vedas), as ascribing supreme power to different gods in turn: hence also sometimes applied to similar phases of other polytheistic religions.

Henothism, not the henothism of Max Müller, or of Hartmann, or of Asmus, but a practical henothism, i. e. the adoration of one God above others as the specific tribal god or as the lord over a particular people, a national or relative monothism, like that of the ancient Israelites, the worship of an absolute sovereign who exacts passive obedience.
Encyc. Brit., XX. 367.

henothistic (hen'ō-thē-is'tik), a. [< henothism + -ist-ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by henothism. Max Müller.

henotic (he-not'ik), a. [< Gr. ênotikos, serving to unite, < ênōin, unite, < ênō (ên-), one.] Tending to make one; unifying; tending to unite or reconcile; harmonizing: as, "henotic teaching," Gladstone.

hen-païde (hen'pā'dl), n. The lump-fish, Cyclopterus lumpus. [Scotch.]

henpeck (hen'pek), v. t. [< Henpecked.] To rule or keep in subjection by superior force of will or assaults of ill temper; domineer over: said of a wife who thus rules her husband.

But—Oh! ye lords of ladies intellectual,
Inform us truly, have they not hen-peck'd you all?
Byron, Don Juan, I. 22.

henpeck (hen'pek), n. [< henpeck, v.] The rule or control of a husband by his wife; henpecking. [Rare.]

Dying of heartbreak coupled with henpeck.
Carlyle, Misc., III. 208.

henpecked (hen'pekt), p. a. [Formerly also henpeckt; < hen¹ + pecked, pp. of peck¹.] The epithet alludes to the not uncommon submission of the domestic cock to the plucking by his hens of his hackle-, saddle-, and even breast-feathers.] Governed or controlled entirely by one's wife; domineered over.

A step-dame too I have, a cursed she,
Who rules my hen-peck'd sire, and orders me.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Eclogues, iii. 49.

He (Rip Van Winkle) was . . . an obedient, hen-pecked husband. . . . Those men are most apt to be obsequious and conciliating abroad who are under the discipline of shrews at home.
Irving, Rip Van Winkle.

henpeckery (hen'pek'er-i), n. [< henpeck + -ery.] The condition of being henpecked. Dickens, Oliver Twist, xxxvii. [Rare.]

hen-plant (hen'plant), n. The rib-grass, Plantago lanceolata; also, the door-yard plantain, P. major.

Henrician (hen-rish'an), n. and a. [< ML. Henricianus, < Henricus, Latinized form of MHG. Heinrich, Heimrich, OHG. Heimari, Heimri, G. Heinrich, E. Henry, a proper name.] 1. n. 1. One of a sect of religious reformers in Switzerland and southern France in the twelfth century, followers of Henry of Lausanne.—2. a. A follower or an adherent of the Emperor Henry IV., who opposed Gregory VII. in favor of the antipope Clement III.

II. a. Pertaining to or effected by Henry VIII. of England; supporting the religious movement or laws of Henry VIII.

Already had Doctor Richard Smith, reader of Divinity in Oxford, a versatile and unfortunate man, been compelled by the Archbishop to retract the chief articles of the Henrician settlement of religion.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

Henriquezia (hen-ri-kwē'zī-ā), n. [NL. (Richard Spruce, 1854), < Henriquez, a proper name.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Rubiaceae, and giving name to a tribe Henriquezieae. The 4-cleft limb of the calyx is deciduous by a transverse section; there are 5 slender stamens in the throat of the corolla; the capsule is large, woody, 2-celled, 2-valved, and shaped like a bean; and the cells are 4-seeded. The genus includes four species of handsome trees, natives of northern Brazil and Venezuela, with stout branches and verticillate, leathery, oblong or obovate, entire leaves. The rose-colored flowers are in dense terminal panicles.

Henriquezieae (hen'ri-kwē-zī-ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Henriquezia + -eae.] A tribe of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, of the natural order Rubiaceae, distinguished by having a 2-lipped imbricate corolla and from 2 to 4 broadly winged seeds in each of the two cells of the capsule. The tribe contains two genera, natives of tropical South America, trees with opposite or verticillate leaves and entire stipules.

hen-roost (hen'röst), n. A place where poultry rest at night.

henry (hen'ri), n. [From Joseph Henry, 1797–1878.] An electrical unit, the induction in a circuit when the electromotive force induced in this circuit is one international volt while the inducing current varies at the rate of one ampere per second.

hen's-bill (henz'bil), n. The sainfoin, Onobrychis sativa, a papilionaceous plant common in Europe; also, any of the species of Onobrychis.

hen's-foot (henz'fut), n. [A translation of the Latin pes pulli, the ancient name of the plant given from the resemblance of its leaves to a hen's claw (Theophrastus, p. 812).] An umbelliferous plant, Caucalis daucoides, found growing in European corn-fields in a chalky soil. Also called bur-parsley and hedgehog-parsley.

Henslowiaceae (hen-slō-vi-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Henslowia + -aceae.] An order of plants proposed by Lindley in 1836 for the sole genus Henslowia of Wallich (not of Blume), subsequently placed by him in the Hydrangeaceae. The genus is now referred to Crypteronia, of the natural order Lythraceae.

Henslovian (hen-slō'vi-an), a. [< Henslow (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to J. S. Henslow (1796–1861), an English botanist.—Henslovian membrane, the cuticle of plants, of which Henslow was one of the discoverers.

Henslowia (hen-slō'vī-ā), n. [NL., named after J. S. Henslow; see Henslovian.] 1. A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Santalaceae, tribe Osyridae, with monœcious or dioecious flowers, the lobes of the perianth 5 or 6 in number and open to the epigynous disk, an inferior ovary, the stamens 5 or 6 in number and inserted at the base of and opposite to the perianth-lobes, and drupaceous 1-seeded fruit. The genus includes 12 species of shrubs, often parasitic on trees, with alternate petioled leaves and small greenish flowers; the species are natives of India, China, and the Malay archipelago. Blume, 1850. 2. A genus of plants, of the natural order Lythraceae, referred by Bentham and Hooker to the genus Crypteronia of the same order. Wallich, 1832.

Henslowia (hen-slō'ī-ō-sē), n. pl. [Henslowia + -ea.] A family of plants introduced by Reichenbach in 1841 for the genus Henslowia of Blume, and placed by him in the Fagineae, as related to the beech, oak, etc.

hensmant, n. An obsolete variant of henschman.
hent¹ (hent), v. t. [ME. henten (pret. hente, pp. hent), also hinten (spelled hyntyn, Prompt. Parv.), seize, snatch, catch, < AS. gehentan, seize, hentan, seize (the simple form only thrice, in legal formula implying 'pursue and seize', i. e. arrest), prob. akin to hunt, q. v. A different word from AS. ge-hendan, ME. henden, E. hend, take hold of, with which it has been confused, but the two words may be ult. connected: see *hend*¹, hand. patica triloba). The old genus Hepatica of Dillenius may be regarded as a subgenus of Anemone.—2. [l. o.] Any liverwort; a cryptogamic plant of the family Hepaticae.

Hepaticae (hē-pat'ī-sē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Hepatica.] A family of small moss-like or thaloid plants of lax cellular texture, usually procumbent and emitting rootlets from beneath; the liverworts. They have the capsule irregularly dehiscent or indehiscent, with spores mixed with thin thread-like cells and containing elaters. The sexual reproductive organs are of two kinds, antheridia and archegonia, the matured archegonium forming the capsule. Asexual reproduction occurs under three forms: by innovations, by gemmæ, and by runners. The liverworts and mosses together form the series Bryophyta. The liverworts differ from the mosses in having their stems bilateral, leaves 2-ranked and without mid-vein, capsule never dehiscent by a special lid, and elaters mixed with the spores. They grow for the most part in moist places upon the ground, upon rocks, or the bark of trees, and a few are even aquatic. They are all chlorophyll-bearing, and green or brownish-green in color. The family Hepaticae, which was first proposed by Adanson in 1763, is now divided into five orders: Ricciaceae, Marchantiaceae, Anthocerotaceae, Monocleaceae, and Junggermanniaceae.

hepatic (hē-pat'ī-kal), a. [hepatic + -al.] Same as hepatic. [Rare.]

hepaticell (hē-pat'ī-sel), n. [hepati(c) + cell.] A hepatic cell; one of the ultimate form-elements of the liver. Cowes.

hepatologist (hē-pat'ī-kol'ō-jist), n. [hepatology + -ist.] One interested in or an authority upon the Hepatica.

hepatology (hē-pat'ī-kol'ō-jī), n. [NL. Hepatica + Gr. -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] The science or study of the Hepatica.

hepaticous (hē-pat'ī-kus), a. [Gr. ἥπατικός, of the liver: see hepatic.] In zool., resembling liver, as in form or color.

hepatine (hep'a-tin), n. [Gr. ἥπαρ (hēpar), the liver, + -ίνη.] Glycogenic matter. Dunnglison.

hepatisation, hepatise. See hepatization, hepatize.

hepatite (hep'a-tit), n. [L. hepatitis, liver-stone, hepatitis, an unknown precious stone, < Gr. ἥπατις, found only in fem. ἥπατις, of or in the liver, liver-colored, also liverwort, < ἥπαρ (hēpar), the liver: see hepatic.] A fetid variety of barium sulphate, or barite, occurring in compact or cleavable masses. Under friction or the application of heat it exhales a fetid odor, due to the presence of carbonaceous matters.

hepatitis (hep-a-ti'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἥπαρ (hēpar), liver, + -itis. Cf. hepatite.] In pathol., inflammation of the liver.

hepatization (hep'a-ti-zā'shon), n. [hepatize + -ation.] 1. Consolidation of substance or tissue, as of the lungs in pneumonia, resulting in a liver-like solidification.

The changes advance unequally (in pneumonia), so that, whilst one portion of the lung is in the stage of red hepatization, another may be in the grey stage—hence the mottled marble appearance of the consolidation.

Quain, Med. Dict., p. 875.

2. The act of impregnating with sulphureted hydrogen gas.

Also spelled hepatisation.

Gray hepatization, in pathol., the second stage of infiltration of the lung in pneumonia.—Red hepatization, the first stage of consolidation of the substance of the lung in pneumonia. The change from the red color to the gray is due to diminished congestion, and to loss of color on the part of the extravasated red blood-corpuscles.

hepatize (hep'a-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hepatized, ppr. hepatizing. [Gr. ἥπατιζέω, be like the liver or liver-colored, < ἥπαρ (hēpar), the liver: see hepatic.] 1. To convert by engorgement and effusion into a substance resembling liver: as, a hepatized lung, in pneumonia.—2. To impregnate with sulphureted hydrogen.

On the right of the river were two wells of hepatized water.

Barrow.

Also spelled hepatise.

her (hēr), pron. See under he.

her. An abbreviation of heraldry.

Hera, Here? (hē'rā, -rē), n. [LL. < Gr. Ἥρα, Ionic Ἥρη, Hera.] In Gr. myth., the greatest feminine divinity of Olympus, queen of heaven, wife and sister of Zeus, and inferior in power to him alone. She was the type of virtuous womanhood, and of the wife and mother. In art she is represented as a majestic woman, fully clad in flowing draperies, characteristically with the stephane or crown on her brow, and bearing a long scepter. By the Romans Hera was early identified with their Juno, originally a distinct divinity; and the Latin name is now commonly given to the Greek goddess.

Here comes to-day,
Pallas and Aphrodite, claiming each
This meed of fairest.

Tennyson, Æneid.

Heraclæan, Heraclæan (her-a-klē'an), a. [LL. Heraclæus, < Gr. Ἡρακλῆος, pertaining to Heracles; see Hercules.] Pertaining to Heracles or Hercules; Herculean. Also spelled Heraclæan.—Heraclæan stone (Latin lapis Heraclæus, Greek λίθος Ἡρακλεία, the magnet: so called from its power of attraction.

Hera.—Statue in Museo Nazionale, Naples.

The power of the Heraclæan stone was well known to the ancients as a matter of curiosity.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 266.

Heraclidean, a. and n. See Heraclidian.

Heraclidean (hē-rak'lē-o-nit), n. [Gr. Heraclidean (see def.) + -ite.] Eccles., a follower of Heraclidean, a Valentinian Gnostic of the second century, noted as a commentator on the Gospel of John.

Heraclēs, n. See Hercules.

Heraclæum (her-a-klē'um), n. [NL. < Gr. Ἡρακλεία, a plant so called, fem. of Ἡρακλῆος, Ἡρακλῆς, Hercules.] A genus of dicotyledonous poly-petalous plants founded by Linnæus, belonging to the natural order Umbelliferae, tribe Peucedaneæ, characterized by its broadly obovate, strongly compressed wing-margined fruit. The genus embraces about 80 species of perennial or biennial herbs, with alternate leaves, and generally white flowers in compound umbels. They are chiefly natives of the temperate regions of the old world. H. lanatum is the only American species. It is known as the cow-parsnip or hogweed, and is eaten by some of the native tribes of North America. A Kamchatkan species yields, when properly treated, a sweet exudation which is employed in the preparation of a distilled spirit. H. Sphondylium, a European species, is used for feeding pigs and sometimes as a domestic remedy.

Heraclid (her'a-klid), n. [L. Heraclides, pl. Heraclidae, < Gr. Ἡρακλῆϊδης, pl. Ἡρακλῆϊδαι, the descendants, as they claimed, of Hercules, < Ἡρακλῆς, Ἡρακλῆς, > L. Hercules, in Gr. myth. the most famous of the heroes: see Hercules.] A descendant of Heracles (Hercules); specifically, one of the Heraclidan or Dorian aristocracy of Sparta, who claimed descent from Hercules through his son Hyllus. Also Heraclid.

Heraclidan, Heraclidean (her-a-klī'dan), a. and n. [Gr. Ἡρακλῆϊδης + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Heraclidean, or descendants of Heracles (Hercules).

On Sull's rock, and Parga's shore,
Exists the remnant of a line
Such as the Doric mothers bore;
And there, perhaps, some seed is sown,
The Heraclidean blood might own.
Byron, Don Juan, iii. 86 (song, st. 13).

II. n. A Heraclid.

Also Heraclidean.

Heraclitan (her-a-klī'tan), a. and n. [Heraclitus (see Heraclitean) + -an.] Same as Heraclitean.

Heraclitanism (her-a-klī'tan-izm), n. [Heraclitan + -ism.] Same as Heracliteanism.

Heraclitean (her'a-klī-tē'an), a. and n. [L. Heracliteus, Gr. Ἡρακλείτης, pertaining to Heraclitus (pl. Ἡρακλείται, the disciples of Heraclitus), < Ἡρακλῆος, L. Hercules.] I. a. Pertaining to the philosopher Heraclitus of Ephesus (who lived about 535-475 B. C.). His work, of which fragments are preserved, was in a prose so sententious, and his opinions were so paradoxical, that the Greeks complained much of his obscurity. He placed great stress upon the element of mediation and continuity in things, especially in time, saying that nothing is or is not, but that all things are in a state of flux—that is, are just in the passage between existence and non-existence, at once going out of being and coming into a new being. The physics of Heraclitus formed the basis of the corresponding part of the Stoical doctrine. Heraclitus maintained the relativity of knowledge in an extreme form, holding that we know nothing of the being of things but only their appearances. His morality was sober, earnest, and a little misanthropical. Also Heraclitic.

II. n. A follower of Heraclitus.

The extreme Heracliteans, as Cratylus, rejected the proposition, or combination of words, as expressing a unity and permanence not to be found in things.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 784.

Also Heraclitan.

Heracliteanism (her'a-klī-tē'an-izm), n. [Heraclitean + -ism.] The philosophical doctrine of Heraclitus. Also Heraclitanism.

Reading the Ephesian doctrine with the eyes of a Cynic, and the Cynic ethics in the light of Heracliteanism, he (Zeno) came to formulate his distinctive theory of the universe far in advance of either. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 562.

Heraclitic (her-a-klit'ik), a. [Gr. Heraclitus (see Heraclitean) + -ic.] Same as Heraclitean.

The Eleatic doctrine that only unity has real being, the Heraclitic counter-doctrine that only change, in the many, is truth to be found. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 784.

Heræon, Heraum (hē-rē'ōn, -um), n. [NL. < Gr. Ἡραϊόν (see tephōn), a place sacred to Hera, < Ἥρα, Ἥρη, Hera; see Hera.] In Gr. antiq., a temple or sanctuary of Hera (Juno).

Heraion (hē-rī'on), n. Same as Heræon.

Heraclæan, Heraclidean. See Heraclidean, Heraclidian.

herald (her'ald), n. [Early mod. E. also herault, heraut, harrot, < ME. herald, heraud, heraud, harawd, herowd, herod, harrold, etc., = D. heraut = late MHG. heralt, herolt, erhalt, G. herold (> Sw. häröld = Dan. heröld), < OF. heralt, heraut, F. herault = Sp. heraldo, heraldo, also farauite = Pg. arauto, also farauite = It. araldo, < ML. haraldus, heraldus, a herald; of OHG. origin. The word appears also as a proper name, Icel. Harald, late AS. Harald, Harold, E. Harold (ult. of G. origin: the reg. AS. form would have been Hereweald*; it occurs reversed in Waldhere) = OS. Hariolt (Diez, etc.), in ML. Chariovaldus, answering to an OHG. Harivald* (or Harivalto*), Hexivald* (the alleged OHG. Heriold, Hariold, Ariwald, Ariwald, are later reflections); < OHG. hari, heri (= AS. here, Icel. herr, etc.), army (see harry), + -wald (= AS. -weald, in comp., strength (OHG. -wald = AS. -weald, ruler), < waltan (= AS. waldan, etc.), rule, have power; see wield. The same first element occurs in harbor, harborough, harbinger, heriot, etc.: see harbor, etc. The particular sense given to herald may have been influenced by OHG. forharo, a herald, < forharēn, proclaim, < fora, fore, + harēn, cry out.] I. An officer sent by a sovereign, a general, or other person of high authority to another, or to an army or public assembly, with a formal message or proclamation, or employed in related duties. The specific office of herald has existed from early historical times; but as still maintained, as in Great Britain, it is merely nominal or restricted to subsidiary functions. In the middle ages the herald was an important adjunct of armies and courts. His person was inviolable. His costume was emblazoned with the armorial bearings of his chief, and constituted an official dress which was a high offense for another person to assume. As armorial bearings became a matter of careful record, the herald was especially charged with the proper depicting and blazoning of achievements, and with the supervision of the assumption of bearings by those who were entitled to them and their prohibition to others, and hence with the genealogy of noble families and the descent of titles. At times questions of precedence, and of the marshaling of ceremonial processions and the like, were referred to heralds. Compare pursuivant and king-at-arms. See Herald's College, below.

An hawraude hies before, the beste of the lordes.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), i. 8014.

The next Day after the Battel, French Heralds came to ask leave to bury their Dead, and had it.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 171.

As I watched the gates,
Lodged on my post, a herald is arrived
From Cæsar's camp. Addison, Cato, il. 1.

The heralds then proclaimed silence until the laws of the tourney should be rehearsed. Scott, Ivanhoe, xii.

2. In extended modern use, any official messenger, especially one charged with a message of defiance, a proposition of peace, or the like.—3. A proclaimer; a publisher; acrier; an announcer of important tidings. [In this sense the word is now much used as the specific name of various newspapers.]

Shall the loud Herald our Success relate,
Or mitred Priest announce the solemn Day?
Prior, Ode to the Queen, st. 26.

The image of the world is the herald of the divine power and wisdom.

Bacon, Fable of Pan.

After my death I wish no other herald,
No other speaker of my living actions. . . .
But such an honest chronicler as Griffith.

Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2.

4. A forerunner; a precursor; a harbinger: sometimes used poetically in apposition or attributively.

It was the lark, the herald of the morn.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 5.

Now the herald lark
Left his ground-nest, high towering to descry
The morn's approach. Milton, P. R., ii. 279.

She with a subtle smile in her mild eyes,
The herald of her triumph, drawing nigh
Half-whisper'd in his ear. Tennyson, Æneid.

5. The red-breasted merganser, Mergus serrator, more fully called herald-duck. See earl-duck, harle. Rev. C. Swainson, 1885. [Shetland

Isles.]—6. A noctuid moth, Gonoptera libatrix: an English collectors' name. See Gonoptera.—Herald-at-arms, in the middle ages, the herald or pursuivant when acting as regulator of a just or tourney, or when deciding upon the bearings allowed to be worn by any person; hence, a general term for a herald.

There was a Herald at Arms sent lately from Paris to Flanders, who by Sound of Trumpet denounced and proclaimed open War against the King of Spain.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 18.

Heralds' College, or College of Arms, a royal corporation in England, instituted in the fifteenth century. Its members are the chief marshal, three kings-at-arms, six heralds, and three pursuivants; and its chief business is the granting of armorial bearings or coats of arms, and the tracing and preservation of genealogies. In Scotland the corresponding functions belong to the Lyon Court. See Lyon king-at-arms, under king-at-arms.

herald (her'ald), v. t. [OF. herauder, heraulder, herald; from the noun.] To proclaim; give tidings of as a herald; announce.

We are sent
To give thee, from our royal master, thanks;
Only to herald thee into his sight, not pay thee.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 8.

She smiled, but something in her smile
Was like the heralding of tears,
When lonely pain the grieved heart bears.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 52.

herald-crab (her'ald-krah), n. A species of crab, Huena heraldica, so called because its carapace presents a fancied resemblance to the heraldic shield and mantle.

heraldic (hê-ral'dik), a. [F. hêraldique = Sp. heraldico = Pg. heraldico; as herald + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to heralds or heraldry, and especially to that branch of heraldry which deals with armorial bearings: as, a heraldic lion; the heraldic representation of birds, beasts, etc.; heraldic blazonry.

As for the heraldic question, although he had not assumed the arms of Clarence, he might have assumed them, or even those of Edward III. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 354.

2. In herpet., giving warning; monitor; as a lizard: as, the heraldic varan, Varanus or Monitor heraldicus, of India.—Heraldic chapter, heraldic college, the Heralds' College, or College of Arms.—Heraldic French, a barbarous sort of French used in heraldic blazonry.—Heraldic shield, a shield charged with heraldic bearings.

heraldical (hê-ral'di-kal), a. [heraldic + -al.] Of a heraldic character; relating to heralds or heraldry. [Rare.]

Making a considerable progress in heraldical and antiquarian studies under his inspection, he published a book.
Wood, Athenæ Oxon.

heraldically (hê-ral'di-kal-i), adv. In a heraldic manner; in accordance with the rules of heraldry.

heraldize (her'ald-diz), v. t.; pret. and pp. heraldized, ppr. heraldizing. [herald + -ize.] To blazon. [Rare.]

herald-moth (her'ald-môth), n. Same as herald, 6.

heraldry (her'ald-ri), n.; pl. heraldries (-riz). [OF. heraulderie, < heralt, heraut, herald: see herald.] 1. The office or duty of a herald; specifically, the art and science of genealogy and precedence; the science of honorary distinctions, and especially of armorial bearings. In modern times heraldry is reduced to the department of armorial delineation, blazonry, and the right of certain persons to certain bearings, except when, as in England, it has to do with marshaling processions, and with the rare ceremonies at which heraldic proclamations are made.

The law of heraldry in war is positive.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 15.

To woo a wench with empty hands
Is no good heraldry; therefore let's to the gold,
And share it equally; 'twill speak for us
More than a thousand compliments or cringes.
Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, iii. 1.

Heraldry became a handmaid of chivalry, and the marshalling of badges, crests, coat-armour, helmets, and other devices of distinction grew into an important branch of knowledge. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 471.

Heraldry is another element by means of which archaeology provides trustworthy canons of criticism in relation to written and unwritten medieval records.
Encyc. Brit., II. 343.

2. A heraldic emblazonment; a coat of arms. [Poetical.]

And in the midst, 'mong thousand heraldries, . . .
A shielded scutcheon blushed with blood of queens and kings.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, st. 24.

Heaps of living gold that daily grow,
And title-scrolls and gorgeous heraldries.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3. Heraldic symbolism.

He, whose sable arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble, . . .
Hath now this dread and black complexion smear'd
With heraldry more dismal; head to foot
Now is he total gules.
Shak., Hamlet, II. 2.

4. Pomp; ceremony. [Poetical.]

He who with all Heaven's heraldry whilere Enter'd the world now bleeds to give us ease.
Milton, Circumcision, l. 10.

Sw. herbarium = Sp. herbario = Pg. hervario = It. erbario, < LL. herbarium*, neut. of L. herbarius, < herba, herb: see herb. Cf. arbor.] 1. A collection of dried plants systematically arranged; a hortus siccus. In the United States a standard herbarium-sheet has been adopted, and all plants are prepared to fit this. The sheets are 16½ inches long and 11½ inches wide, and the paper, which is white, smooth, and stiff, weighs about 28 pounds to the ream. For many European herbariums a smaller size was originally adopted, which it is inexpedient to change. The plants are attached to these sheets either by small gummed strips of paper or by gluing one side of the specimen. The sheets are then inclosed in thick double sheets of heavy manila paper called genus-covers. Each genus-cover contains a single genus, unless this is too large. Where the species of a genus are very numerous, they are placed in thin covers, called species-covers. The name of the genus or species is written in the left-hand lower corner of the cover. The specimens are kept in cases, which consist of a series of compartments 18 inches deep, 12 inches wide, and 5 or 6 inches high, the case having dust-tight doors.

2. A book or other contrivance for preserving dried specimens of plants.—3. An edifice or place in which plants are preserved for botanical purposes.

Herbartian (hêr-bâr'ti-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the eminent German philosopher Johann Friedrich Herbart (1776-1841), or to his system of philosophy. The philosophy of Herbart is characterized by a view of formal logic which holds the conception of continuity (as well as various other fundamental notions) to be self-contradictory. He maintained that the metaphysically real is a plurality of simple beings connected by real relationship consisting in a sort of attraction. He sought to express the fundamental principles of ontology and psychology by means of algebraical formulae, whence his philosophy is sometimes called exact realism. The Herbartian philosophy has exerted considerable influence upon the development of psychology in Germany.

II. n. One who accepts the philosophical doctrines of Herbart.

herbary (hêr'ba-ri), n.; pl. herbaries (-riz). [Also herbery; in part < herb + -ery, but ult. < LL. herbarium: see herbarium. Cf. OF. herberie, botany.] A garden of herbs.

Ἡράκλῆς, earlier Ἡρακλῆς, lit. having or showing Hera's glory, < Ἥρα, Hera, + κλέος, glory, fame: see glory.] 1. In Gr. and Rom. myth., a mighty hero, originating in Greek legend, but adopted by the Romans, and worshiped as the god of physical strength, courage, and related qualities. According to the mythical account, his father, Zeus (Jupiter), destined him to the sovereignty of Thyrus by right of his mother, Alcmena, granddaughter of Persens, but was thwarted by Hera (Juno). After Hercules had performed wonderful deeds in behalf of Thebes, his birthplace, Hera consented to his being made immortal on condition of his accomplishing certain superhuman feats for his rival Eurystheus of Thyrus, in which he succeeded. These feats, called the twelve labors of Hercules, were as follows: (1) the strangling of the Nemean lion; (2) the killing of the Lernean hydra; (3) the capture of the Ceryneian stag; (4) the capture of the Erymanthian boar; (5) the cleaning of the Augean stables; (6) the slaughter of the Stymphean birds; (7) the capture of the Cretan bull; (8) the capture of the man-eating mares of Diomedes; (9) the securing of the girdle of Hippolyta, queen of the Amazons; (10) the fetching of the red oxen of Geryones; (11) the procuring of the golden apples of the Hesperides; (12) the bringing to the upper world of the dog Cerberus, guardian of Hades. The subject of this most famous of the Herculean legends (of comparatively late date) is distinguished as the Thyrnthian Hercules from other personifications of Hercules worshiped in different places and countries (as the Cretan or the Egyptian Hercules, etc.), under the same or other names. The attributes of these various personifications being essentially the same, but their legendary history being different. Hercules is represented as brawny and muscular, with broad shoulders, generally naked, or draped merely in the skin of the Nemean lion, the head of the lion being often drawn over that of the hero as a helmet. He is usually armed with a club, sometimes with a bow and arrows.

Leave that labour to great Hercules;
And let it be more than Alcides' twelve.

Shak., T. of the S., i, 2.

My Eustace might have sat for Hercules;

So muscular he spread, so broad of breast.

Tennyson, Gardener's Daughter.

2. One of the ancient constellations, between Lyra and Corona Borealis, representing a man upon one knee, with his head toward the south, and with uplifted arms. The ancients did not identify the constellation with Hercules; the moderns place a club in one hand, and a bunch of an apple-tree, with the three heads of Cerberus in the other. The constellation contains one star of the second magnitude (β), nine of the third, and twelve of the fourth.

3. A form of drop-hammer. See the extract.

The Hercules, a ponderous mass of iron attached to a vertical guide rod, which was lifted originally by a gang of men with ropes, but afterwards by steam power, and allowed to fall by its own weight. Encyc. Brit., XI, 425.

4. Same as Hercules-beetle.—Hercules' allheal, a perennial umbelliferous plant, Opopanax Chironium, a native of southern Europe. The roots and seeds are said to be similar in flavor and quality to the parsnip. Also called painwort.—Hercules' club, a weapon mentioned in the seventeenth century as consisting of a heavy head of wood with nails driven into it and furnished with a handle; apparently a weapon extemporized for the defense of a fortified place.—Hercules' Pillars. See pillar.

Hercules-beetle (hēr'kū-lēz-bē'tl), n. A very large Brazilian lamellicorn beetle, Megasoma or Dynastes hercules. A large horn projects from the head of the male, and there is a smaller similar projection hereditably (hēr-ed'i-tā-bli), adv. Heritably; by inheritance. [Rare.]

hereditament (hēr-ē-dit'a-ment), n. [< ME. hereditamentum = Pr. heretamentum = Sp. hereditamento = Pg. hereditamento, < ML. hereditamentum, property inherited, < LL. hereditare, inherit: see hereditabile.] In law, any species of property that may be inherited; lands, tenements, or anything corporeal or incorporeal, real, personal, or mixed, that may descend to an heir in the strict sense (see heir, 1); inheritable property, as distinguished from property which necessarily terminates with the life of the owner, and, according to some writers, as distinguished in modern times from personal assets which go to the executor or administrator instead of the heir. A corporeal hereditament is visible and tangible; an incorporeal hereditament is a right existing in contemplation of law, issuing out of corporeal property, but not itself the object of bodily senses as an easement, a franchise, or a rent.

At the whiche parliament y^e Duke of Alenson was tured to lose his hede, & his hereditamentys to be forfayted unto y^e kinge.

Fabyan, Chron., 11, an. 1461.

Their ancestors had no estate in any theire landes, signories, or hereditamentes, longer then during their owne lyes.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

hereditarian (hēr-ed'i-tā-ri-an), n. [< hereditary + -arian.] A believer in the biological doctrine of heredity or atavism.

The modern hereditarian regards himself as the offspring mentally as well as physically of a long succession of ancestors, going as far back as the anthropoid ape, if not to still more rudimentary forms of life.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, I. 446.

hereditarily (hēr-ed'i-tā-ri-li), adv. By inheritance.

Richard I. bestowed the lands on Richard Fitz-Anchor, to hold them in fee, and hereditarily of the abbey.

Pg. hereditario = It. ereditario, < L. hereditarius, of or relating to an inheritance, inherited, < heredita (-t-), heirship, inheritance: see heredit.] 1. In law: (a) Descending by inheritance; transmitted or transmissible in the line of descent by force of law; passing to or held by an heir or heirs: as, a hereditary monarchy, office, or estate; hereditary privileges; hereditary bondage.

These old fellows

Have their ingratitude in them hereditarily.

Shak., T. of A., ii. 2.

The community or kingdom comes to be regarded by the sovereign as the hereditary possession of his family.

Calhoun, Works, I. 84.

At first elective, as kingships habitually are, this [of Poland] continued so — never became hereditary.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 494.

(b) Holding by inheritance; deriving from ancestors by force of law, as rank, social condition, or property: as, a hereditary peer, proprietor, or bondman.

When . . . a powerful body of hereditary nobles surround the sovereign, they oppose a strong resistance to his authority.

Calhoun, Works, I. 85.

His highness the duke . . . had been married very young, and his son, the hereditary prince, may be said to have been the political sovereign of the state.

Thackeray, Barry Lyndon, x.

2. Pertaining to or resulting from successive generation; transmitted in a line of progeny; passing naturally from parent to offspring: as, hereditary descent; a hereditary line; hereditary features, qualities, or diseases.

Wearing that yoke

My shoulder was predestined to receive,

Born to the hereditary stoop and crease.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 206.

The peculiarity may be congenital and hereditary, as it is when a certain stature is characteristic of the brothers, sisters, and collateral relatives of a parent.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 175.

3. Native; patrimonial; ancestral: as, one's hereditary home or occupation; a hereditary opinion or prejudice. — 4. Acting from natal tendency or endowment; having inherited the character or qualifications of; being by force of birth: as, the Bachs were hereditary musicians; the Rothschilds are hereditary financiers. — Act of the Hereditary Excise. See *excise*². — Hereditary monarchy. See monarchy.

hereditism (hēr-ed'i-tizm), n. [< hereditary + -ism.] The principle of heredity; the doctrine of hereditary transmission, as of political rule. [Rare.]

At last, hereditism expired in America, . . . because the people were determined not to have a king, and were animated by republican aspirations.

Nineteenth Century, XX. 815.

heredity (hēr-ed'i-ti), n. [= F. hérédité = Pr. heretat = Sp. heredad = Pg. herdade = It. eredità, < L. heredita (-t-), heirship, inheritance, in concrete an inheritance, < heres (hered-), an heir: see heir, and heritage, inherit.] 1. Hereditary descent or transmission, as of physical or mental qualities; hereditary succession or influence.

He is a monarchist by centuries of heredity.

N. A. Rev., CXLIH. 106.

Let us engage in some exciting sport, dear — such as reviewing the family portraits, with genealogical applications; perhaps we may discover something startling in the line of heredity.

J. W. Palmer, After his Kind, p. 231. 2. Specifically, in biol.: (a) The influence of parents upon offspring; transmission of qualities or characteristics, mental or physical, from parents to offspring. See atavism.

By heredity is meant the tendency manifested by an organism to develop in the likeness of its progenitor.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XII. 176.

(b) The principle or fact of inheritance, or the transmission of physical and mental characteristics from parent to offspring, regarded as the conservative factor in evolution, opposing the tendency to variation under conditions of environment.

That wheat produces wheat — that existing oxen have descended from ancestral oxen — that unfolding organism eventually takes the form of the class, order, genus, and species from which it sprang — is a fact which by force of repetition, has acquired in our minds almost the aspect of a necessity. It is in this, however, that Heredity is principally displayed: the phenomena commonly referred to it being quite subordinate manifestations.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biology, § 80.

heredium (hēr-rē'di-um), n. [L. heres (hered-), an heir.] In early Rom. law, the homestead or hereditary domain allotted as the private property of a citizen, and which was inheritable and alienable. It comprised space for house, yard, and garden — usually about one and a quarter acres.

Blunt, Dict. of Sects (1874), p. 184.

heresy (her'e-si), n.; pl. heresies (-siz). [< ME. heresye, heresie, eresie, < OF. heresie, herégie, F. hérésie = Pr. herégia, erégia = Sp. heregía = Pg. herégia, heresia = It. eresia, heresy, < L. heresis, a school of thought (philosophical or religious), LL. eccl., heretical religious doctrine, heresy, < Gr. ἀρειος, a taking, selection, a philosophical principle or set of principles and those who profess such principles, a sect, school, eccl., a religious sect or party, heresy, < ἀρειος, take, mid. ἀρειοθαί, take to oneself, choose.] 1. Any doctrine, opinion, or set of opinions at variance with the established standards of any system, school of thought, or party; an opinion or a doctrine tending to create schism or division; an untenable or a disturbing doctrine of any kind, as in philosophy, science, politics, morality, etc.

Such trespasses in speech (whereof there be many) as geue colour and disliking to the eare & minde, by any foule indecencie or disproportion of sound, situation, or sense, they be called, and not without cause, the vicious parts or rather heresies of language.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 129.

Popes, conclaves, and religious orders rose up against the Copernican heresy.

Macaulay, Sadler's Law of Population.

2. Specifically, in theol., an opinion or a doctrine rejected by the authorities of a church as contrary to the established creed of that church; an interpretation or a theological view of a sacred writing or other standard of religion, or of any distinctive part of it, opposed to that authoritatively established or generally accepted: as, the antinomian heresy. To the Roman Catholic any opinion contrary to the teachings of his church, to the Protestant any opinion contrary to the accepted interpretation of the Scripture, is a heresy. The error must be held by a professed believer; pagan and infidel doctrines are not heresies. Roman Catholic divines distinguish between formal heresies, or tenets contrary to the doctrines of the church which are wilfully and pertinaciously held, and material heresies, or tenets that are heretical but are not so pertinaciously held as to involve the guilt of heresy.

There shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them.

2 Pet. ii, 1.

After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers.

Acts xxiv, 14.

Heresy is in the Will and choice professedly against the Scripture; error is against the Will, in misunderstanding the Scripture after all sincere endeavours to understand it rightly.

Milton, True Religion.

A second offence is that of heresy, which consists not in a total denial of Christianity, but of some of its essential doctrines, publicly and obstinately avowed.

Blackstone, Com., IV, iv.

Antipodal heretic. See antipodal. = Syn. See comparison under heretic.

heretic (her'e-tik), n. and a. [Formerly heretick, early mod. E. also eretic; < ME. heretik, eretik (cf. One who holds and persistently maintains an opinion or a doctrine at variance with the accepted standards of any school or party, and rejected or condemned by it; one who rejects a generally accepted belief.

I am an heretic, if it be sound doctrine that pleasure tastes best after sorrow.

Donne, Letters, lxxxiv.

Constantine easily believed that the heretics, who presumed to dispute his opinions, or to oppose his commands, were guilty of the most absurd and criminal obstinacy.

Gibbon, Decline and Fall, xxi.

2. Specifically, in theol., a professed believer who adopts and persistently maintains religious opinions contrary to the accepted standards of his church. See heresy, 2.

This yere [xii. Hen. VIII.] one Luther was accountyd an eretyck, and on a Sunday, that was the xij. day of Maij, in the presence of the Lorde Legate, and many other Bishops and Lordys of England, the sayd Luther was openly declared an heretyck at Powles Crosse, and all his bookes burned.

Arnold's Chron. (2d ed. 1520, repr. 1811), p. lii.

= Syn. Heretic, Schismatic, Sectary, Dissenter, Nonconformist. Heretic is an opprobrious epithet for a professed believer who holds religious opinions contrary to the established or dominant beliefs. A schismatic is one who seeks to sunder or divide into different organizations or parties those who are of essentially the same religious faith. A sectary or sectarian is one who sets the welfare of his own sect or denomination above that of the church universal, often pushing its interests at the cost of the general Christian welfare. This word has been much used opprobriously of those who stand out against an original or more powerful organization. A dissenter or nonconformist is one who dissents from an established religion, or does not conform to it; specifically and in actual use these words apply almost exclusively to those Protestants in Great Britain who worship apart from the Established Church of England, as the Presbyterians, Baptists, and Independents.

If a person was so unfortunate as to be a bravo, a libertine, or a gambler, that was no reason for making him a heretic too.

Macaulay, Von Ranke's Hist. Popes.

Unity was Dante's leading doctrine, and therefore he puts Mahomet among the schismatics, not because he divided the Church, but the faith.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 108.

Anno 1683, divers sectaries in religion beginning to spread themselves there [the Virginia colonies], great restraints were laid upon them, under severe penalties, to prevent their increase.

heritage (her-i-tāj), n. [< ME. heritage, eritage, < OF. heritage (It. eritage = Pr. heretatge = OSP. heretage = It. ereditaggio), an inheritance, heritage, patrimony, < heriter, inherit, < LL. hereditare, inherit, < L. heres (hered-), heir: see heir, and cf. hereditary, inherit, etc.] 1. That which is inherited as a material possession; an inheritance or inherited estate; specifically, in Scots law, heritable estate; realty.

The whiche is the same Lond that oure Lord beghiten us in Heritage.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 3.

I . . . will bring them again, every man to his heritage, and every man to his land.
Jer. xii. 15.

2. That which is given or received as a permanent possession or right; that which is allotted or appropriated; hence, portion; part: used in the Bible for the chosen people, the body of saints, or the church, as God's portion of mankind.

Proceed we cheereily in our Pilgrimage Towards our happy promys'd Heritage.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii. The Decay.

This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors, which they shall receive of the Almighty.
Job xxvii. 13.

Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them.
Joel ii. 17.

While the hollow oak our palace is,
Our heritage the sea.

A. Cunningham, A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sea.

3. That which comes from the circumstances of birth; a condition or quality transmitted by ancestors; inherited lot or portion: as, a heritage of luxury, poverty, suffering, or shame.

The people's charity was your heritage, and I would see which of you deserves his birthright.

Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, v. 1.

Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. xxiv.

Heritiera (he-rit-i-ē-rā), n. [NL. (Aiton, 1789), named after C. L. L'Heritier, a French botanist of the 18th century.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, belonging to the natural order Sterculiaceae, tribe Sterculieae. It is characterized by its small, reddish, imperfect, apetalous flowers, 5-toothed calyx, staminal column bearing 5 anthers, and fruit consisting of 5 indehiscent 1-seeded hard carpels. The genus consists of 3 or 5 species, handsome trees of considerable size, with entire alternate leaves, and flowers in axillary panicles, natives of the coasts of tropical Asia and Australia. H. Formes is the red mangrove or sunder tree of India. It produces a valuable dark wood, used in India for boats, bridges, and house-building. H. macrophylla of Burma is the looking-glass tree, a name that is also applied to the other species.

heritor (her-i-tor), n. [A Latin-seeming form of heriter, ult. < L. hereditarius, hereditary: see heriter.] In Scots law, the proprietor of a heritable subject; a proprietor or landholder in a parish.

If any heritor or farmer wad pay him four pounds Scots out of each hundred pounds of valued rent, . . . Rob engaged to keep them scathless.
Scott, Rob Roy, xxvi.

herling, hirling (hēr-ling), n. [Sc.; origin obscure. Cf. herring.] The young of the sea-trout.

Sea trout, and river trout, and bull trout, . . . and herlings, which frequent the Nith.
Scott, Abbot, xxiv.

hermæ, n. Plural of hermes, 2.

Hermæa (hēr-mā-ē), n. [NL.; < Gr. Ἡρμαῖος, of Hermes: see Hermes.] A genus of sea-slugs, gastropods of the family Eolididae, or giving name to the Hermæidae, having numerous gills and broad flattened or folded tentacles, as H. bifida. H. cruciata is a New England species.

hermæid (hēr-mā-ēd), n. A gastropod of the family Hermæidae.

Hermæidae (hēr-mā-ēd-ē), n. pl. [NL.; < Hermæa + -idae.] A family of nudibranchiate or notobranchiate gastropods, taking name from the genus Hermæa.

Hermæic (hēr-mā-ēk), a. [< Gr. Ἡρμαῖός, of or like Hermes: see Hermes.] 1. Of or relating to Hermes or Mercury. Cudworth.—2. Of or pertaining to Hermes Trismegistus; Hermetic; as, "Hermæic subtlety," W. Mathews, Getting on in the World, p. 124.

Hermæical (hēr-mā-ēkal), a. [< Hermæic + -al.] Same as Hermæic.

hermandad (er-mān-dād), n. [Sp., a brotherhood, < hermano, a brother, < L. germanus, kindred: see *german*¹, germane.] In Spain, originally, a voluntary organization (the Santa Hermandad or Holy Brotherhood) for the maintenance of public order. The first hermandad was formed in Aragon in the thirteenth century, and another in Castile and Leon a few years later, chiefly to resist the exactions and robberies of the nobles. They soon assumed general police and judicial powers, under royal sanction; and at the end of the fifteenth century the organizations were united and extended over the whole kingdom. The hermandad was soon afterward reorganized as a regular national police, which has been superseded in later times by a civic guard on the model of the French garderie.

Heriades carinatum. (Cross shows natural size.)

family Apidae, having 2-jointed maxillary palpi, and the third joint of the labial palpi inserted in the side of the second. There are about 12 species, equally divided between Europe and North America. H. campanularum and H. carinatum are examples.

heriet, v. t. See *heriet*².

heriert, n. See herrier.

heriot (her-i-ōt), n. [Formerly also hariot, harriot; < ME. heriet, i. e., heryet*, < AS. heretega, military equipment, as a technical term heriot, < here, army, + geatu*, only in pl. geatwa, geatwe, equipment, equipments. arms. The term was early extended from its lit. sense.] In Eng. law, a feudal service, tribute, or fine, as the best beast or other chattel, payable to the lord of the fee on the decease of the owner, landholder, or vassal. Originally the heriot consisted of military furniture, or of horses and arms, which went to equip the vassal's successor. Heriots from freholders are now rare, but heriots from copyholders are not so. The distinction between heriot and relief is that the former implies the immediate succession of the heir, who pays the heriot in recognition of his having succeeded, and the latter is paid in recognition of the fact that the lord has recovered his ownership, but has consented to make, as it were, a new concession to the heir. Compare farleu.

What stranger soever dye in the lordships, the lord shall have his beast (best) for an harriot, or horse if he haue any.
English Glde (E. E. T. S.), p. 433.

There was no attempt to establish that iron bulwark of despotism, a standing army: at least, none nearer than that of the voluntary levies of the hermandad, raised and paid by the people. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 26.

Hermannæ (hër-man'ê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1847), < Hermannia + -æ.] A tribe of the Byttneriaceæ: same as Hermanniceæ.

Hermannia (hër-man'î-â), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), named after Paul Hermann, professor of botany at Leyden in the 17th century. The proper name G. Hermann, D. Hermann, Harmen, E. Herman, Harmon, etc., means 'a soldier,' being in AS. hermann (OHG. hariman, herman, MHG. herman, etc.), < here, army, + mann, man. See harry, herald, etc.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Sterculiaceæ, tribe Hermanniceæ, distinguished mainly by its 5-lobed calyx, 5 petals with hollowed claws, 5 stamens with filaments oblong or dilated above, many-ovuled ovary, and 5-valved capsule with reniform seeds. The genus embraces 30 species, chiefly South African—shrubs with toothed or incised alternate leaves, and yellow or red nodding flowers in the axils of the leaves or in a terminal cluster. Three species occur in Texas and Mexico.

Hermannieæ (hër-ma-nî'ê-ê), n. pl. [NL., < Hermannia + -æ.] A tribe of plants, of the natural order Sterculiaceæ, typified by the genus Hermannia, characterized by marcescent petals, chiefly monadelphous stamens, and capsular fruit. They inhabit the warmer regions of both hemispheres.

hermaphrodite (hër-maf-rô-dê'î-ti), n. [Irreg. < hermaphrod(ite) + -ity.] Hermaphroditism. [Rare.]

Some do believe hermaphroditely,
That both do act and suffer.

hermaphrodis (hër-maf'rô-diz-m), n. A shortened form of hermaphroditism.

Hermaphrodita (hër-maf-rô-dî'tî), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. hermaphroditus, taken as an adj.: see hermaphrodite.] In De Blainville's classification (1825), one of three subclasses of his Paracephalophora, contrasted with Dioica and Monioica, and containing the orders Cirribranchiata (tooth-shells), Cervicobranchiata (limpets), and Scutibranchiata (sea-ears, limpets). It corresponds somewhat to the Linnean genus Patella.

Hermaphroditanthæ (hër-maf'rô-dî-tan'thê), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐρμαφρόδιτος, hermaphroditos, + άνθος, a flower.] 1. A general classifying name for plants with hermaphrodite flowers. — 2. A suborder of the Araceæ, including Calla and related forms. Schott, 1832.

hermaphrodite (hër-maf'rô-dî-t), n. and a. [= F. hermaphroditus = Sp. hermaphrodita, hermaphroditus = Pg. hermaphrodite = It. ermafrodito, < L. hermaphroditus, < Gr. ἐρμαφρόδιτος, a hermaphrodite, so called from Ἑρμαφρόδιτος, Hermaphroditus, in myth. son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus); according to the legend, he became united in one body with the nymph Salmacis while bathing in her fountain; < Ἑρμης, Hermes, + Ἀφροδίτη, Aphrodite.] 1. n. 1. A human being in whom the sexual characteristics of both sexes are to some extent, really or apparently, combined; also, one of the higher animals which is similarly deformed. Such monstrosities are really of one sex or the other, but are generally imperfectly developed with respect to either. They are hence specifically called spurious hermaphrodites.

Nor man nor woman, scarce hermaphrodite.
Drayton, Moon Cal.

2. One of those lower animals which normally possess the parts of generation of both the male and the female, so that reproduction can take place without the union of two individuals. Such animals are called true hermaphrodites. They are those which have both an ovary and a testis, or a female and a male genital gland, in one and the same individual, as is very often the case among mollusks and worms. The essential organs of both sexes may exist simultaneously, or the animal may be male at one time and female at another; but in either case it is capable of self-impregnation. A variation of this case is seen in some animals, as earthworms, which are hermaphroditic yet copulate, each impregnating the other. True hermaphrodites occur only as an anomaly among vertebrates, but there are authentic instances of the development of a testis on one side of the body and an ovary on the other; and embryologically all sexual animals are hermaphrodites before the primitively similar genital gland has assumed the special characters of either sex.

3. In bot., a flower that contains both the stamen and the pistil perfectly developed, or the male and female organs of generation, within the same floral envelop or on the same receptacle. See perfect.

II. a. Same as hermaphroditic. — Hermaphrodite brig, flower, gland, etc. See the nouns.

hermaphroditic (hër-maf-rô-dî'tîk), a. [< hermaphroditos + -ic.] Affected with or pertaining to hermaphroditism; having the character of a hermaphrodite; being of both sexes.

Look on me, and with all thine eyes,
Male, female, yea, hermaphroditic eyes.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, i. 1.

hermaphroditical (hër-maf-rô-dî'tî-kal), a. [< hermaphroditos + -al.] Same as hermaphroditic.

Cry down, or up, what they like or dislike in a brain or a fashion, with most masculine, or rather hermaphroditical authority.

B. Jonson, Epicene, i. 1.

hermaphroditically (hër-maf-rô-dî'tî-kal-i), adv. As a hermaphrodite.

hermaphroditism (hër-maf'rô-dî-tizm), n. [= Sp. hermaphroditismo = Pg. hermaphroditismo; as hermaphrodite + -ism.] The state of being a hermaphrodite; union, real or apparent, of the two sexes in the same individual. Also hermaphrodisism.

Many Turbellarians, especially the Acœla, display the phenomenon known as "successive hermaphroditism," the male organs of an individual attain to maturity first, and the female organs become ripe subsequently. During copulation, therefore, one individual is physiologically a male and the other a female. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 174.

True hermaphroditism exists only when the essential organs of reproduction, both kinds of germ-glands, are united in one individual. Either an ovary is then developed on the right and a testis on the left, or vice versa; or testes and ovaries are developed on both sides, one more, the other less perfectly.

Haeckel, Evolution of Man (trans.), II. 423.

Dimidiated hermaphroditism, true hermaphroditism of the kind which consists in the development of a testis on one side of the body and an ovary on the other, in animals which are normally of opposite sexes. This condition has been not infrequently observed.

Hermas (hër'mas), n. [NL.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, founded by the younger Linnaeus in 1781, belonging to the natural order Umbelliferae, tribe Mulinææ, characterized by its conspicuous petaloid calyx-lobes, filiform petals, and dorsally compressed fruit. The genus embraces 5 species of perennial caespitose herbs, with radical undivided leaves and crowded compound umbels of white or dark-purple flowers, natives of the Cape of Good Hope. The epidermis of the leaves of H. gigantea, separated from the veins and midrib, is used by the Hottentots as a tinder, and is also made into miniature socks, gloves, etc.

hermelet, n. A Middle English form of hair-meal. Chaucer.

hermelinet, n. Same as ermine.

hermeneut (hër-mê-nût), n. [< Gr. ἑρμηνεύτης, an interpreter, < ἑρμηνεύω, interpret, < Ἑρμης, Hermes, an interpreter, usually referred to 'Ερμης, Hermes, as the tutelary god of skill, the arts and sciences, speech, writing, etc.: see Hermes.] An interpreter; one who explains; an exegete; specifically, one of the hermeneutæ. [Rare.]

hermeneutæ (hër-mê-nû'tê), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑρμηνευταί, pl. of ἑρμηνεύτης: see hermeneut.] Interpreters employed in the early church to translate the service into the language of the worshippers, when the language used by the ministers was different from that of his hearers.

hermeneutic (hër-mê-nû'tîk), a. [< Gr. ἑρμηνευτικός, of or for interpreting, < ἑρμηνεύτης, an interpreter: see hermeneut.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of interpretation or exegesis; explanatory; exegetical: as, hermeneutic theology (that is, the art of expounding the Scriptures).

hermeneutically (hër-mê-nû'tî-kal-i), adv. By interpretation or exegesis; according to the established principles of interpretation.

hermeneutics (hër-mê-nû'tîks), n. [Pl. of hermeneutic: see -ics. Cf. Gr. ἑρμηνευτική (so. τέχνη, art), hermeneuticæ.] The art or science of interpretation or exegesis; also, the study of or instruction in the principles of exegesis: as, a professor of hermeneutics.

We have to deplore that the field of sacred hermeneutics has lately too often been made an arena of fierce fightings and uncharitable disputations.

Dr. C. Wordsworth.

No legend, no allegory, no nursery rhyme, is safe from the hermeneutics of a thoroughgoing mythologic theorist.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 287.

Biblical hermeneutics, that branch of theological science which treats of the principles of the interpretation of Scripture.

hermeneutist (hër-mê-nû'tîst), n. [< hermeneutic + -ist.] One versed in hermeneutics; an expounder of the principles of interpretation.

Hermes (hër'mêz), n. [Gr. Ἑρμης, Doric Ἑρμᾶς, contr. of Ἑρμῆας, Epic Ἑρμῆας, the messenger of the gods; a deity of varied attributes, some of which connect him with the etymologically identical Skt. Saramaya, in the dual, two dogs (having, among other epithets, that of garvara, spotted, = Gr. Κέρβερος, L. Cerberus, q. v.) who guarded the way to the abode of the dead, and also acted as messengers of Yama, < Saramâ, a messenger of Indra, + -eya, a suffix of relation or descent.] 1. In Gr. myth., the herald and messenger of the gods, protector of herdsmen, god of science, commerce, invention, and the arts of life, and patron of travelers and rogues, son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Maia, born on Mount Cyllene in Arcadia. He was the guide (psychopompos) of the shades of the dead to their final abode. In art he is represented as a vigorous youth, beardless after the archaic period, and usually but slightly draped, with caduceus, petasus, and talaria as attributes. The Roman Mercury, a god of much more material and sordid character, became identified with Hermes. See the cut of Hermes of Praxiteles, under Greek, a.

The basest horn of his hoof is more musical than the pipe of Hermes.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. 7.

That moily,

That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave.
Milton, Comus, l. 637.

2. [l. c.; pl. hermæ (-mê).] In Gr. antiqu., a head or bust supported upon a quadrangular base, which corresponds roughly in mass to the absent body, and often bears in front a phallus as an indication of the sex. The bust was often double-faced, as if representing two individuals back to back. These monuments were so called because the god Hermes was frequently so represented. Such statues of him were placed at the doors of houses in Athens, and at the corners of streets, in his character as tutelary divinity of highways and boundaries, in gymnasia, and in other public places. The hermæ were held in great reverence as guarding or symbolizing many of the common interests of life. Compare gaine.

ners of streets, in his character as tutelary divinity of highways and boundaries, in gymnasia, and in other public places. The hermæ were held in great reverence as guarding or symbolizing many of the common interests of life. Compare gaine.

3. The Egyptian god Thoth, as identified with the Greek Hermes.—Hermes Trismegistus (Gr. Ἑρμῆς τριμῆστος, L. Hermes Trimegistus, 'thrice-greatest Hermes'), a name of the Egyptian god Thoth, under which many Greek works (forty-two according to Clement of Alexandria) were ascribed to him in the second century A. D. (See Hermetica, 2.) The Egyptians called Thoth "twice greatest," and the Greek writers of these books called him "thrice greatest."

Hermesian (hër-mê'si-an), a. [< Hermes (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to Georg Hermes. See Hermesianism.

Hermesianism (hër-mê'si-an-izm), n. [< Hermesian + -ism.] In Rom. Cath. theol., a rationalizing theory of the relation of reason to faith, propounded by Georg Hermes (1775–1831), a German Roman Catholic theologian, and accepted by many German Catholics, but condemned after his death by the Holy See.

Hermetic (hër-met'îk), a. [< ML. Hermeticus, relating to Hermes or to alchemy or chemistry, < Hermes, Hermes, with reference to Hermes Trismegistus, regarded as the author of occult sciences, and esp. of alchemy (philosophia hermetica): see Hermes, and Hermes Trismegistus, under Hermes.] 1. Of or pertaining to Hermes. — 2. [cap. or l. c.] Pertaining to Hermes Trismegistus, or to the theosophy, cosmogony, and later alchemy and astrology associated with his name; alchemic. Thoth, the Egyptian Hermes, was supposed to have written certain sacred books of the Egyptian priests, which treated of the doctrine and ritual of religion and various natural sciences. In the second century after Christ, these true Hermetic books having been forgotten (for they were always kept secret), other books appeared, containing a jumble of incongruous theosophical and philosophical ideas, bearing the name of Hermes Trismegistus as their author, and assumed to be the ancient sacred books of Egypt. They were doubtless written by Alexandrian Neo-Platonists. To them were added alchemical and astrological books attributed to the same author.

Their seals, their characters, hermetic rings.

B. Jonson, Underwoods, lxii.

Among the numerous students of hermetic philosophy, not one appears to have desisted from the task of transmutation from conviction of its impossibility, but from weariness of toil or impatience of delay, a broken body or exhausted fortune.

Rambler, No. 68.

It is well known that I have approached more nearly to projection than any other hermetic artist who now lives.

Scott, Kenilworth, xviii.

In solitude and utter silence did the disciples of the Hermetic Philosophy toll from day to day, from night to night.

Longfellow, Hyperion, iii.

3. [l. c.] Of or pertaining to a hermes: as, a hermetic column.—Hermetic art, alchemy; chemistry.

The dream of the philosopher's stone induces dupes, under the more plausible delusions of the hermetic art, to neglect all rational means of improving their fortunes.

Burke.

Hermetic column, a column terminated by the head and shoulders of a man; a hermes.—Hermetic medicine, an old system of medicine, founded upon chemical doctrines; spagyric seal.—Hermetic seal, an alchemic or chemical seal; an air-tight closure of a vessel effected by fusion, soldering, or welding.

Not nature, but grace and glory, with an hermetic seal, give us a new signature.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 67.

Hermetical (hër-met'î-kal), a. [< Hermetic + -al.] Same as Hermetic.

And what the hermetical philosophy saith of God is in a sense verifiable of the thus ennobled soul, that its centre is every where, but its circumference is when.

Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xiv.

hermetically (hër-met'î-kal-i), adv. 1. According to the Hermetic books; agreeably with Hermetic philosophy; esoterically; secretly.—2. In a hermetic manner; chemically; specifically, by means of fusion: as, a vessel hermetically sealed or closed.

This little tube was open at one end, and the other . . . was hermetically sealed.

Boyle, Works, I. 21.

hermetics (hër-met'îks), n. [Pl. of hermetic: see -ics.] Hermetic philosophy; the body of doctrine contained in the Hermetic books; secret science; esoterism: a term popularly confounded with alchemy, and conceived to indicate the art of manipulating salt, sulphur, and mercury in some incomprehensible manner whereby the philosopher's stone might be produced.

Herminia (hër-min'î-i-ä), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802), < L. Herminia, fem. of Herminius, a Roman name.] The typical genus of moths of the family Herminiidae, having slender, not pilous, palpi, with the third joint much shorter than the second. There are many species in all quarters of the globe.

Herminiidae (hër-mi-ni'î-dë), n. pl. [NL., < Herminia + -idae.] A family of geometrid moths, taking name from the genus Herminia, having the wings not angulate, and the front not prominent. There are upward of 60 genera. Some of the species are known as snout-moths. Also written Herminida, Herminide.

Herminium (hër-min'î-um), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), < Gr. êpûs or êpûv, a bedpost, < êpua, a prop, support.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, belonging to the natural order Orchideae, tribe Ophrydeae. Its distinguishing features are its spurless lip, very short column, erect emarginate anther, naked glands to the pollinia, and oblong erect capsule. The genus consists of 6 species of low slender herbs, with few, generally narrow, leaves and small flowers, densely racemed or spiked, growing in the temperate and mountainous regions of Europe and Asia. H. Monorchis is the musk-orchid of Europe. It has a slender stem 3 to 6 inches high, and yellowish-green flowers in a terminal spike.

hermit (hër'mit), n. [The form heremite, more correctly eremite, as now pronounced, is directly from the LL. eremita, ML. improp. heremita (see eremite); the form hermit is old, < ME. hermite, heremite, eremite, < OF. hermite, ermite, hermite, F. ermite, hermite = Pr. ermita = Sp. Pg. eremita = It. eremita, romito (cf. OF. hermitain = Pr. hermitan = Sp. ermitaño = Pg. ermitão, < ML. eremitanus), < LL. eremita, ML. often improp. heremita, < Gr. ἐρημίτης, a hermit, prop. adj., of the desert, < ἐρημία, a solitude, desert, wilderness, < ἐρημος, desolate, lonely, solitary, akin to ἡρέμω, quietly, gently, softly, Goth. rīmīs, rest, quiet, Skt. ṛam, stop, rest, be content.] 1. One who dwells alone, or with but few companions, in a desert or other solitary place, for religious meditation, or from a desire to avoid society. See anchorite.

The most perfect hermits are supposed to have passed many days without food, many nights without sleep, and many years without speaking.

Gibbon, Decline and Fall, xxxvii.

2†. A beadsman; one bound to pray for another.

In thy dumb action I will be as perfect

As begging hermits in their holy prayers.

Shak., Tit. And., III. 2.

For those of old,

And the late dignities heap'd up to them,
We rest your hermits.

Shak., Macbeth, I. 6.

3. In 2001, one of sundry animals of solitary or secluded habits. See the compounds.

The house-hunting adventures of the hermits [hermit-crabs] have been so frequently described that a repetition is useless.

Amer. Naturalist, XXII. 894.

False hermit. See false.—Syn. 1. Monk (see anchorite), ascetic, solitary.

hermitage (hër'mi-tāj), n. [< ME. hermitage, heremytage, eremitage, < OF. hermitage, ermitage, F. ermitage, hermitage (= Pr. ermitage = Pg. eremitagem = It. eremitaggio, romitaggio), < hermite, ermite, a hermit: see hermit.] 1. The habitation of a hermit or of a company of hermits; a hermit's cell or hut, usually in a desert or solitary place; hence, any secluded habitation.

A little lowly Hermitage it was,
Downe in a dale, hard by a forests side.

Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 34.

A court does some man no harm, when another finds temptation in a hermitage.

Donne, Sermons, xxix.

A chapel, and thereby

A holy hermit in a hermitage.

Tennyson, Holy Grail.

2. [cap.] A French wine produced from vineyards on the sides of a hill rising from the river Rhône near Valence, in the department of Drôme: so called from a hermitage which anciently existed there. The red Hermitage is the most celebrated and most abundant; very little of the white Hermitage is made, and still less of the straw-colored or paillé. Also Ermitage.

Two more [drops] of the same kind heightened it into a perfect Languedoc; from thence it passed into a florid Hermitage.

Addison, Tatler, No. 131.

hermitary (hër'mi-tä-ri), n.; pl. hermitaries (-riz). [< hermit + -ary. Cf. ML. heremitarius, n., a hermit, < heremita, eremita, a hermit.] A hermit's cell annexed to an abbey; a hermitage.

hermit-bird (hër'mit-bërd), n. 1. A hummingbird of the genus Phaethornis, as the Cayenne hermit-bird, P. superciliosus.—2. A South American barbet or puff-bird of the genus Motacilla; a num-bird. There are several species.

hermit-crab (hër'mit-krah'), n. A crab of the family Paguridae (which see). This crab has neither a long hard tail like a shrimp or crawfish, nor yet a short one doubled underneath like ordinary crabs, but a soft fleshy one requiring to be covered and protected. To this end it takes possession of and occupies a cast-off shell of some univalve mollusk, such as a periwinkle or a small whelk. The crab backs into the shell, inserting the tender abdomen in the spire, and filling the aperture of the shell with his claws and other hard parts, thus guarding his otherwise unprotected and vulnerable rear. In moving about, the crab carries his house with him, like a snail with his shell on his back, and quits it for another only when he outgrows it. In many cases sea-anemones grow on the shell, the triple association furnishing an excellent example of commensalism. (See cut under cancer-social.) There are several genera and numerous species of hermit-crabs; the commonest belong to Pagurus and Eupagurus. (See cut under Eupagurus.) The Diogenes crab, a species of Cenobita, belongs here. The most common hermit-crab on the Atlantic coast of the United States is the short-armed hermit, Eupagurus pollicaris, attaining a large size and inhabiting the shells of such mollusks as Pyrrula and Natica. It is called by the fishermen jack-in-the-box, thief, and stone-lobster, and is believed by some to turn into a lobster.

hermit-crow (hër'mit-kro'), n. The chough, Fregilus or Pyrrhocorax graculus. See cut under chough.

hermitess (hër'mi-tes), n. [< hermit + -ess. Cf. equiv. OF. hermitresse.] A female hermit.

The violet is truly the hermitess of flowers.

Parthenia Sacra (1638), p. 38.

hermitical (hër'mit'î-kal), a. [< hermit + -ical. Cf. heremitical, eremitical.] Pertaining or suited to a hermit or to retired life; eremitical (the more common word).

You describe so well your hermitical state of life that none of your ancient anchorites could go beyond you, for a cave in the rock, with a fine spring, or any of the accommodations that befit a solitary.

Pope, to E. Blount, xi.

hermit-thrush (hër'mit-thrush'), n. A very common true thrush of North America, found in nearly all parts of the continent. It is about 7½ inches long, olive above shading into rufous on the tail, white below tinged with pale tawny, and profusely spotted on the breast with dark brown. It is a shy and secluded inhabitant of woodland and undergrowth, migratory and insectivorous, and a fine songster. It nests on the ground, laying 4 or 5 pale-bluish eggs. There are several varieties of the hermit-thrush, giving rise to a number of technical names, among which Turdus pallasi, T. nanus, and T. unalasce are most frequently used. See cut in next column.

hermit-warbler (hër'mit-wär'bler), n. The western warbler, Dendroica occidentalis, one of several relatives of the common black-throated green warbler (D. virens) of the United States.

Hermit-thrush (Turdus pallasi).

It is 5 inches long, 7½ in extent of wings, ashy-gray above tinged with olive and streaked with black, the top and sides of the head rich yellow marked with black, the throat and breast black, ending in a convex border sharply contrasted with the white of the other under parts. It is found from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific.

hermodactyl (hër-mō-dak'til), n. [< LGr. ἐρμωδάκτυλος, a plant identified by some with Colchicum autumnale, by others with Iris tuberosa; lit. 'Hermes's finger,' < Ἑρμῆς, Hermes, + δάκτυλος, finger.] In phar., a dried bulbous root, probably obtained from Colchicum variegatum or checker-flower, formerly brought from Turkey in considerable quantities, and much esteemed as a cathartic, but now entirely discarded.

Hermogenean (hër-mō-jë'në-an), a. and n. [< L. Hermogenes, < Gr. Ἑρμογένης, Hermogenes (< Ἑρμῆς, Hermes, + -γενής, -born), + -e-an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Hermogenes or his doctrines. See II.

II. n. A follower of Hermogenes, who lived near the close of the second century, and who held matter to be eternal and the source of all evil, but in other respects was an orthodox Christian.

Hermogenian (hër-mō-jë'nî-an), a. and n. [< LL. Hermogenianus, a. and n., < L. Hermogenes, < Gr. Ἑρμογένης, Hermogenes: see Hermogenean.] 1. a. 1. Same as Hermogenean.—2. Of or pertaining to Hermogenianus, a noted Roman jurist who lived in the fourth century, the writer of several works on jurisprudence, and the reputed compiler of the "Codex Hermogenianus," or Hermogenian code. See code.

The Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes were arranged upon a different principle.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 367.

II. n. Same as Hermogenean.

hern (hër'n), n. [< ME. herne, hyrne, < AS. hyrne, a corner, < horn, a horn, a projecting point. Cf. corner, ult. < L. cornu = AS. E. horn.] A corner.

As yonge clerkes . . .

Seken in every halke and every herne

Particular sciences for to lerne

Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, I. 393.

The stone that was reprovyd

Of men that were biggand,

In the hede of the herne

Is now made liggende.

MS. Cantab. F. v. 43, f. 91. (Halliwell.)

hern (hër'n), pron. [E. dial., < her + -n, adj. formative. Cf. hñn.] Hers. [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

His heart kep' goin' pity-pat,

But hern went pity Zeke.

Lowell, The Courtin'.

hern (hër'n), n. [< ME. hern, herne, contr. of heron, heiron, heron: see heron.] Same as heron.

I come from haunts of coot and hern.

Tennyson, The Brook.

hern (hër'n), n. An obsolete form of hern.

hern (hër'n), n. [Cornish.] The pilchard. Also hernan.

Hernandia (hër-nan'di-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), after Dr. Hernandez, a Spanish botanist. The Sp. proper name Hernandez, Hernando, formerly Fernandez, Fernando, F. Ferdinand, G. Ferdinand, is of OHG. origin.] A genus of apetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Lawrinceae, tribe Hernandieae, characterized by its laterally dehiscent anthers, stamens as many as the 6-8 segments of the perianth and opposite them, and 1-celled ovary with broad stigma. The genus includes 6 or 8 species of trees with monocious yellowish flowers, 3 in an involucre, the central one sessile and fertile, and the lateral ones staminate with short pedicels. The leaves are alternate, entire, ovate or petate, and the drupe is inclosed in the enlarged involucre. The plants grow in the tropical regions of both hemispheres. H. Sonora, or jack-in-a-box, is so called from the noise made by the wind whistling through its persistent involucre. The juice of the leaves is a powerful depilatory, destroying the hair without pain wherever it is applied. The wood is light; that of H. Guianensis takes fire readily from a flint and steel, and is used in the same way as amadou.

Jack-in-a-box (Hernandia Sonora).

Hernandiaceæ (hēr-nan-dī-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hernandia + -aceæ.] A natural order of plants, typified by the genus Hernandia, established by Endlicher in 1836: now synonymous with Laurineæ.

Hernandiæ (hēr-nan-dī-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hernandia + -eæ.] A division of apetalous plants, made by Lindley (1847) a tribe of the Thymelæaceæ with Hernandia as the type, and by others a tribe of the Laurineæ embracing the single genus Hernandia.

hernant-seeds (hēr-nant-sēdz), n. pl. The seeds of Hernandia ovigera, used in dyeing. [Trade-name.]

hernepant, n. See harn-pan.

hernert (hēr'nēr), n. [Early mod. E. also hearnor; contr. of heroner, as hern³ of heron: see heroner.] Same as heroner. Cotgrave.

hernia (hēr-nī-ā), n. [= F. hernie = Pr. Sp. Pg. hernia = It. ernia, < L. hernia, a rupture, hernia.] In surg., a tumor formed by the displacement and protrusion of a part which has escaped from its natural cavity by some aperture, and projects externally; rupture: as, hernia of the brain, of the thorax, or of the abdomen. Hernia of the abdomen, the most common form, consists of the protrusion of some part of the viscera through a natural or an accidental aperture in the inner wall of the abdomen, the external skin generally remaining unbroken. It is named specifically from its situation.

—Cerebral hernia, protrusion of the brain through an opening in the cranial walls. —Cruel hernia. Same as femoral hernia. —Femoral hernia, a hernia descending beside the femoral vessels. Also called crural hernia. —Inguinal hernia, a hernia of the intestine or omentum which descends through the abdominal rings. —Lumbar hernia, a hernia in the loins or lumbar region. —Oblique inguinal hernia, a hernia whose course is that of the spermatic cord, through the inguinal canal: opposed to direct inguinal hernia. —Phrenic hernia, a hernia projecting through the diaphragm into one of the pleural cavities. —Strangulated hernia, a hernia so tightly compressed in some part of the channel through which it has been protruded as not to be reducible by ordinary means, as by the application of pressure, and to interfere with the circulation in the protruded part. —Umbilical hernia, hernia of the intestine at the navel; exomphalos.

hernial (hēr-nī-āl), a. [= OF. hernial; as hernia + -al.] Pertaining to or connected with hernia. Also hernious.

Herniaria (hēr-nī-ā-ri-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), < L. herniaria: hernia see hernia and def.] A genus of small prostrate plants, belonging to the tribe Paronychiæ of the natural order Illecebræceæ. It is chiefly distinguished by its 5-cleft perianth, short style with 2 stigmas, annular embryo, and inferior radicle. The genus includes 8 or 10 species of annual or perennial herbs, with small entire leaves, scarious stipules, and minute green flowers, crowded in the axils. They are natives of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and were formerly supposed to be useful in the cure of hernia; hence the generic name and the common name rupturewort.

herniated (hēr-nī-ā-ted), a. [< hernia + -ated + -ed².] Affected with hernia; enveloped in a hernial sac.

In another class of cases the herniated loop becomes fixed to the abdominal wall by adhesions after reduction. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL 304.

hernioid (hēr-nī-oid), a. [< hernia + -oid.] Resembling hernia.

In this place may be mentioned the curious and sometimes puzzling hernioid protrusions to be met with in some plants. Bessey, Botany, p. 29.

herniology (hēr-nī-ol-ō-jī), n. [< L. hernia, hernia, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. That branch of surgery which treats of ruptures. — 2. A treatise on ruptures.

herniotomy (hēr-nī-ot-ō-mī), n. [< L. hernia, hernia, + Gr. -τομή, a cutting, < τέμνω, τεμνέω, cut.] In surg., the operation of cutting for hernia; celotomy.

hernious (hēr-nī-us), a. [< hernia + -ous.] Same as hernial.

hernsew (hēr'n'sū), n. [Early mod. E. also hearnsew, hernsew; a contr. of heronsew, q. v. Cf. hernshaw².] Same as heronsew. [Prov. Eng.]

Leaving me to stalk here, . . .

Like a tame her'nshaw for you.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, l. 1.

hernshaw¹ (hēr'n'shā), n. [< hern³ + shaw.] A shaw or wood in which herons breed; a heronry.

Hatbronner [F.], a heron's nest or ayrie; a hernshaw, or shaw or wood wherein herons breed. Cotgrave.

hernshaw² (hēr'n'shā), n. [Formerly also hernshaw, a contr. of heronshaw; a var. of hernsew, heronsew (appar. not by association with hernshaw¹, a heronry, which appears to be later): see heronsew.] 1†. A heron; a heronsew.

As when a cast of Paulcons make their flight,
At an Hernshaw, that lies aloft on wing.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. vii. 9.

2. In her., the representation of a heron, crane, or stork (all appearing alike). — To know a hawk from a hernshaw. See under hand-saw.

hero (hē'rō), n.; pl. heroes (-rōz). [< OF. heroe, F. héros = Sp. héroe = Pg. heroe = It. eroe, < L. heros, acc. heroem, < Gr. ἦρος, a hero, usually a warrior, but in Homer a comprehensive term, and orig. applied to any freeman, being appar. = Skt. vīra, a man, a hero, = L. vir, a man, = Goth. wair = AS. wer, a man: see werigild, werwolf.] 1. In classical myth., a superior being, distinguished from ordinary men chiefly by greater physical strength, courage, and ability, at the time of the Homeric poems still regarded as mortal, but from the time of Hesiod (about the eighth century B. C.) regarded as intermediate in nature between gods and men (a demigod), and immortal. Except in the case of Hercules, the Greek cult of heroes was essentially local, each country, region, or even town holding its own in especial honor. Thus Theseus was the national hero of Attica, Ajax was especially honored in Salamis, Amphiarus at Orchomenus; while Lycurgus became a hero in Sparta, and Hesiod himself in Boeotia. The ancient veneration of heroes was to some extent parallel with that now paid to the saints of Christianity.

Kings and queens, and heroes old,

Such as the wise Demodocus once told

In solemn songs at King Alcinoüs' feast.

Milton, Vac. Ex., l. 47.

2. A man of distinguished valor, intrepidity, or enterprise in danger; a prominent or central personage in any remarkable action or event; one who exhibits extraordinary courage, firmness, fortitude, or intellectual greatness in any course of action.

Behold Achilles' promise fully paid,

Twelve Trojan heroes offer'd to thy shade.

Pope, Iliad, xxiii.

It would not do to have too many heroes and saints. An army made up wholly of generals would win no battles. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 33.

3. The principal male personage in a poem, play, or story, or the person who has the chief place and share in the transactions related, as Achilles in the Iliad, Odysseus (Ulysses) in the Odyssey, Æneas in the Æneid.

The shining quality of an epic hero, his magnanimity, his constancy, his patience, his piety, . . . raises first our admiration. Dryden, Æneid, Ded.

Why not a summer's as a winter's tale? . . .

Heroic if you will, or what you will,

Or be yourself your hero. Tennyson, Princess, Prol.

4. A person regarded as heroic; one invested by opinion with heroic qualities.

The war was a popular one, and as a natural consequence, soldiers and sailors were heroes everywhere.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xli.

No one is a hero to his valet.

Proverb.

heroa, n. Plural of heroum, heroön.

heroarchy (hē'rō-ār-kī), n.; pl. heroarchies (-kīz). [< Gr. ἥρωα, a hero, + ἀρχή, rule, < ἀρχεω, rule.] See the extract.

All dignities of rank, on which human association rests, are what we may call a Heroarchy (Government of Heroes)—or a Hierarchy, for it is "sacred" enough withal! Carlyle, Heroes and Hero-Worship, i.

Herodiæ (he-rō'dī-ē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl.] Same as Herodii, 2. Nitzsch.

Herodian¹ (hē-rō'dī-an), a. and n. [< LL. Herodianus, < Herodes, < Gr. Ἡρόδης, Herod, < ἥρος, a hero, + -δης, patronymic suffix.] 1. a. Pertaining to Herod the Great, king of the Jews, or to the family of Herod or its partizans.

We are no advocates of that Herodian policy which profanely and sacrilegiously would subject the things of God to the will of Cæsar.

By. Chr. Wordsworth, Church of Ireland, p. 172.

II. n. A member of a party among the Jews in the time of Christ and the apostles, adherents of the family of Herod. The Herodians constituted a political party rather than a religious sect. Some writers suppose that they were for the most part Sadducees in religion.

The Herodians appear as supporters of the claim of the Roman Emperors to receive tribute-money from the Jews. H. B. Hackett, Smith's Bible Dict., p. 1054.

herodian² (he-rō'dī-an), n. One of the Herodii or Herodiones.

Herodias (he-rō'dī-as), n. [NL., also written Herodius (LL. herodius) and prop. Erodius, < Gr. Ἡρώδης, a heron: see Ardea.] A genus of large white herons or egrets. H. egretta is the great white egret of North America. H. alba is the corresponding European form. See cut under egret.

Herodii (he-rō'dī-i), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Herodius.] 1. In the broadest sense, same as Herodiones or Pelargomorphæ. — 2. In a more restricted sense, the heron series of altricial grallatorial birds: a suborder or superfamily excluding storks and ibises. The leading family is Ardeideæ. Also Herodiæ.

Herodiones (he-rō'dī-ō'nēs), n. pl. [NL., pl. of LL. herodion (-n), also herodius, a bird, perhaps the stork, < Gr. Ἡρώδιος, a heron: see Herodias.] An order of birds, the altricial desmognathous grallatores, or herons, storks, ibises, spoonbills, and their allies, corresponding to Herodii in a broad sense, or to Pelargomorphæ. In some uses of the name certain incongruous forms have been included, but are now eliminated. The Culicivirostres and the Grallatores of some authors are correspondent groups. The Herodiones are divisible into three suborders, Ibides, Pelargi, and Herodii.

The group here noted (Herodiones) corresponds to the Pelargomorphæ of Huxley, the Ciconiiformes of Garrod (minus Cathartideæ), the Grallatores altinæ of Sundevall, and includes the Herodiæ, Pelargi, and Hemigliotides of Nitzsch—respectively the Heron series, the Stork series, and the series of Ibises and Spoonbills.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 648.

herodionine (he-rō'dī-ō'nin), a. [< Herodion-es + -ine¹.] Of or pertaining to the Herodiones; heron-like; ardeine, in a broad sense.

Herodius (he-rō'dī-us), n. [NL.] Same as Herodias.

Herodotean (hē-rōd-ō-tē'an), a. [< Herodotus + -e-an.] Pertaining to, characteristic of, or in the style of Herodotus, a Greek historian of the fifth century B. C., called the "father of history."

Roger of Hoveden is quite Herodotean both in the faithfulness of his personal relations and in the wish to incorporate in his chronicle all that he can gather touching the geography and history of strange lands.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 148.

heroess† (hē'rō-es), n. [< hero + -ess. Cf. Gr. ἥρωσσα, contr. ἥρώσσα, fem. of ἥρως, hero: see hero.] A female hero; a heroine.

But all th' heroesses in Pluto's house,

That then encounter'd me, exceeds my might

To name or number.

Chapman, Odyssey, xl.

heroic (hē-rō'ik), a. and n. [Formerly heroick; = F. héroïque = Sp. heroico = Pg. heroico = It. eroico, < L. heroicus, < Gr. ἥρωϊκός, of or for a hero, < ἥρως, a hero: see hero.] 1. a. Having or displaying the character or attributes of a hero; daring; intrepid; determined: as, a heroic warrior or explorer.

He [Henry IV.]

From John of Gaunt doth bring his pedigree,

Being but fourth of that heroic line.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 5.

The Heroic Sufferer for principle and generous affection wins the love of all uncorrupted hearts.

Channing, Perfect Life, p. 179.

2. Of or pertaining to heroes; suitable to the character of a hero; bold, daring, noble, or commanding in proportions, form, or quality: as, a heroic statue or monument; a heroic poem or symphony; a heroic enterprise; specifically, in art, larger than life: said of a statue, or a figure in a picture. See heroic size, below.

Goe on both hand in hand, O Nations, never to be disunited; be the Praise and the Heroic Song of all Posterity.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

An heroic poem, truly such, is the greatest work which the soul of man is capable to perform.

Dryden, Æneid, Ded.

I would have every thing to be esteemed as heroic which is great and uncommon in the circumstances of the man who performs it.

Steele, Tatler, No. 202.

While the golden lyre

Is ever sounding in heroic ears

Heroic hymns. Tennyson, Tiresias.

3. Having recourse to extreme measures; boldly experimental; daring; rash: as, heroic treatment.

Here again an improvement on the heroic practice of Alva and Romero. Molloy, United Netherlands, III. 456.

Heroic age, in Gr. hist. or myth., the age when the heroes are supposed to have lived, a semi-mythical period preceding that which is truly historic. See hero, 1. — Heroic size, in the fine arts, any size larger than life: usually taken as a size intermediate between that of life and the colossal: as, a statue of heroic size. — Heroic verse, a form of verse adapted to the treatment of heroic or exalted themes: in classical poetry, the hexameter; in English, as also in German, the iambic of ten syllables; and in French, the Alexandrian (which see). The following is an example of English heroic verse:

Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring

Of woes unnumbered, heavenly goddess, sing!

Pope, Iliad, i. 1.

= Syn. Gallant, Valiant, etc. (see brave), daring, fearless, dauntless.

II. n. 1†. A hero.

Many other particular circumstances of his [Homer's] gods assisting the ancient heroics might justly breed offence to any serious reader. Jackson.

2. A heroic verse: most frequently used in the plural, sometimes sarcastically in the sense of bombast, or extravagant expressions of admiration or praise: as, to go into heroics over a picture.

Tom Otway came next, Tom Shadwell's dear Zany,
And swears for heroics, he writes best of any.

Rochester, Trial of Poets for the Bays.

heroical (hē-rō'ī-kal), a. [< heroic + -al.] Same as heroic. [Rare.]

The heroical be properly understood of demi-gods, as of Hercules and Æneas, whose parents were said to be, the one celestial, the other mortal, yet it is also transferred to them who for their greatness of mind came near to God.

Drayton, England's Heroical Epistles, To the Reader.

Many noble gentlemen and heroical spirits were to venture their honours, lives and fortunes.

R. Peake (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 626).

heroically (hē-rō'ī-kal-ī), adv. In a heroic manner; with signal valor or fortitude; courageously; intrepidly; audaciously: as, the wall was heroically defended.

He [Lord Craven] and the Duke of Albemarle (the noted Monk) heroically stayed in town during the dreadful pestilence.

Pennant, London, p. 214.

The garden bloomed and faded ten times over before Miss Manners found herself to be forty-six years old, which she heroically acknowledged one fine day to the census-taker.

R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 42.

heroicalness (hē-rō'ī-kal-nes), n. The quality of being heroic; heroism. Sir K. Digby. [Rare.]

heroically (hē-rō'ī-kal-ī), adv. [< heroic + -ly.] Like a hero; heroically. [Rare.]

Samson hath quit himself

Like Samson, and heroically hath finish'd

A life heroic.

Milton, S. A., I. 1710.

heroicness (hē-rō'ī-kal-nes), n. Heroicalness. [Rare.]

heroicomic (hē-rō'ī-kom'ik), a. [= F. héroï-comique; as heroic + comic.] Blending the heroic and the ludicrous; consisting of lofty burlesque: as, a heroicomic poem.

heroicomic (hē-rō'ī-kom'ik), a. [< heroic + -al.] Same as heroicomic.

heroid (hē-rō'id), n. [= F. héroïde, < Gr. hērōis (hērōis), of heroic verse, < hērōs, a hero: see hero.] A poem in the epistolary form, expressive of heroic sentiments: from the Heroides or heroic epistles of Ovid.

heroify (hē-rō'ī-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. heroified, prp. heroifying. [< hero + -ify.] To make heroic; give a heroic character to. [Rare.]

This act of Weston has heroified the profession.

Brummel.

heroine (her'ō-in), n. [< OF. heroine, F. héroïne = Sp. heroína = Pg. heroína = It. eroína, < L. heroína, a demigoddess, heroine, < Gr. hērōinē, a heroine, prop. fem. of hērōinos, adj., of a hero, < hērōs, a hero: see hero.] 1. A female hero; a heroic woman.

Heroes and heroines shouts confusedly rise; . . .

Like Gods they fight, nor dread a mortal wound.

Pope, B. of the L., v. 41.

When dames and heroines of the golden year

Shall . . . rain an April of ovation round

Their statuses, borne aloft. Tennyson, Princess, vi.

2. The principal female character in a poem, play, story, or romance, or the woman who plays the most important part.

"Take Lilla, then, for heroine," clamour'd he,

"And make her some great Princess, six feet high."

Tennyson, Princess, ProI.

heroism (her'ō-izm), n. [= F. héroïsme = Sp. heroísmo = It. eroismo; as hero + -ism.] The qualities of a hero, as courage, intrepidity, fortitude, etc.; heroic character or action.

If the Odyssey be less noble than the Iliad, it is more instructive; the Iliad abounds with more heroism, this with more morality. W. Broome, Notes to the Odyssey.

Heroism is the self-devotion of genius manifesting itself in action. Hare.

Heroism, like cowardice, is contagious.

J. H. Ewing, We and the World.

= Syn. Valor, gallantry, daring, boldness, fearlessness. See brave and heroic.

heroistic (hē-rō'is'tik), a. [< hero + -ist + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting heroism; relating to a hero or heroine. [Rare.]

Agreeably, however, to the heroistic account of her, not only was she not called Ursa, but, etc.

The Nation, Aug. 18, 1881, p. 141.

heroize (hē-rō'iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. heroized, prp. heroizing. [< hero + -ize.] To make or represent as heroic. [Rare.]

As in all other heroized forms of the god of the dead, there is both a terrible and a wise and beneficent side in the character of Minos. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 478.

heron (her'on), n. [(1) Early mod. E. also heroun; < ME. heroum, heyrum, heiron, < OF.

hairon, also heron, F. héron, dial. éyron = Pr. aïron = Sp. aïron = Cat. agro = It. aghirone, airone, a heron; with aug. suffix -on, -one, < OHG. heigir, MHG. heiger, a heron, = Icel. hegr = Sw. häger = Dan. hejre, a heron. (2) The Scand. forms answer better to OHG. hehara, a magpie, a jay, MHG. heher, G. heher, hähler, a jay, jackdaw, = AS. higora, higera, a magpie, or jay-woodpecker (cf. E. dial. heighaw, a woodpecker). (3) A third group of forms appears in MHG. reiger, G. reier = MLG. reiger = D. reiger = OS. hreiera = AS. hrāgra, a heron. These groups are not related, except as they may all be ult. imitative. Cf. W. cregyr, a screamer, a heron, < creg, cry, hoarse; L. graculus, graculus, a jackdaw; and E. *crake*² and *crow*².

From the same source (OHG. through OF.) comes E. egret, q. v. Hence contr. *hern*³, q. v.] A long-legged, long-necked, long-billed, slender-bodied wading bird; any bird of the family Ardeidae, but especially of the subfamily Ardeinæ. Herons, including egrets, bitterns, etc., have the bill cleft below the eyes, naked legs, scaly legs bare above the shank, long toes fitted for perching, a comb on the nail of the middle toe, ample rounded wings, and short tail; the plumage is loose, and often develops graceful flowing plumes, whence the name egret; a constant characteristic is the presence of two or more pairs of powder-down tracts, or patches of greasy pulpules. Herons are aquatic and feed on fish and other creatures which they stalk for and capture by spearing with the sharp bill; they generally nest in trees, and lay two or three greenish, whole-colored, elliptical eggs. (See heronry.) They are nearly cosmopolitan, and include numerous species of several modern genera, such as Ardea, Herodias, Nycticorax, and Botaurus. The common heron of Europe is Ardea cinerea, represented in America by the great blue heron, A. herodias, 3½ to 4 feet long, and nearly 6 feet in expanse. The great white heron of Florida, A. occidentalis, is still larger; and the goliath heron of Africa, A. goliath, is probably the largest of all. White herons or egrets are of medium and small size. Night-herons are smaller, and green herons among the least of all. Bitterns are herons of the subfamily Botaurinæ. Boat-billed herons form the subfamily Cameroniinæ. See Ardeidae, Herodiones, and cuts under Ardea, bittern, and egret.

Herons seem encumbered with too much sail for their light bodies. Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, xlii.

And the heron, the shuh-shuh-gah,

From her nest among the pine-trees,

Gave a cry of lamentation.

Longfellow, Hiawatha, v.

heronert, n. [< ME. heroner, heronere, < OF. heronnier, q. v., a falcon trained to fly at the heron, < hairon, a heron: see heron. Hence contr. herner, q. v.] A falcon trained to fly at the heron, exclusively or principally.

Ech for his vertu holden is for deere,
Both heroner and faucon for ryvere.

Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 413.

heronry (her'on-ri), n.; pl. heronries (-riz). [< heron + -ry.] A place where herons breed in large numbers. Most kinds of herons congregate in hundreds, sometimes thousands, to breed in woods or swamps, constructing loose bulky nests of sticks, etc., which are placed on trees or bushes, less frequently on the ground. The birds resort year after year to the same places, and some of these heronries have become historical.

The heronry at Cressi-hall, which is a curiosity I never could manage to see. Four score nests of such a bird on one tree is a rarity which I would ride half as many miles to have a sight of.

Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, xxii.

Pine Island has a heronry. The American, XIV. 238.

heron's-bill (her'onz-bil), n. A name of plants of the genus Erodium, natural order Geraniaceæ, particularly E. cicutarium and E. moschatum, from the supposed resemblance of the long-beaked fruit to the head and breast of a heron. Also called stork's-bill.

heronsey (her'on-sī), n. [Early mod. E. also heronseye, heronsey, heronseugh; < ME. heronseye, < OF. heronseye*, found only in the earlier form heroncel, AF. heroncel, a heron (with dim. suffix -cel, -ceau, as also in F. bionceau, OF. bioncel, dim. of bion, lion, grifoncel, dim. of grifon, griffin), equiv. to OF. haironneau, F. heronneau (with dim. -eau, -el), < hairon, F. héron, a heron: see heron. Hence by contraction heronsey, and by variation *hernshaw*², q. v.] A heron. [Now only prov. Eng.]

I wol nat tellen of her strange sewes,

Ne of her swaunes, ne of her heronseyes.

Chaucer, Squire's Tale, I. 60.

And the heronseye shall be arayed in the same manner without any moysture, & he shulde be eten with salte and poude.

Babees Book (E. E. S.), p. 278.

heronshaw¹ (her'on-shā), n. [Also contr. *hernshaw*², q. v.] A variant of heronsey.

So have we seene a hawke cast off at an heron-shaw, to looke and fle a quite other way.

Ep. Hall, Quo Vadis?, p. 59.

heroögon (hē-rō-og'ō-ni), n. [< Gr. hērōs, a hero, < -yonia, generation: see -gony.] A begetting or an imaginative creation of heroes; a genealogy of heroes. [Rare.]

A brief and abruptly terminated heroögon or generation of heroes by immortal sires from mortal mothers.

Encyc. Brit., XI. 777.

heroölogist (hē-rō-ol'ō-jist), n. [< heroölogy + -ist.] One who writes or discourses of heroes. Warton. [Rare.]

heroölogy (hē-rō-ol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. hērōologia, a tale of heroes, < hērōs, a hero, < -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] A body of legendary or traditional lore relating to heroes; a history of or a treatise on heroes. [Rare.]

From the above specimens in Tacitus we may conclude that all the Teutonic races had a pretty fully developed heroölogy.

Grimm, Teut. Mythol. (trans.), I. 366.

heroon, n. See heroum.

Herophilist (hē-rof'ī-list), n. [< Herophilus (see def.) + -ist.] A disciple of Herophilus, leader of one of the earliest schools of medicine in Alexandria (about 300 B. C.), and one of the first exact anatomists.

The Herophilists still revered the memory of Hippocrates, and wrote numerous commentaries on his works.

Encyc. Brit., XV. 801.

Hero's fountain. See fountain.

heroship (hē-rō-shīp), n. [< hero + -ship.] The character, condition, or career of a hero.

He . . . his three years of heroship expired,

Returns indignant to the slighted plow.

Cowper, Task, iv. 644.

If he refused to sign, his heroship was lost.

L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 347.

heroudt, n. A Middle English form of herald.

heroum, heroon (hē-rō'um, -on), n.; pl. heroes (-ē). [L. heroum, < Gr. hērōon (sc. hērōn or ēdōs), the shrine or temple of a hero, neut. of hērōon, hērōus, of a hero, < hērōs, a hero: see hero.] In Gr. antiq., a temple or shrine sacred to the memory of a hero, often erected over his reputed tomb.

The group [at Tegea] of Epochos supporting the wounded Ankeos, whose axe was falling from his hand, was probably rendered much as in the reliefs representing this hunt on the heroon at Gjölbaschi in Lycia, now in Vienna.

A. S. Murray, Greek Sculpture, II. 288.

hero-worship (hē-rō-wēr'ship), n. The worship of heroes, practised by ancient nations of antiquity; hence, reverence paid to heroes or great men, or to their memory.

Hero-worship, heartfelt prostrate admiration, submission, burning, boundless, for a noblest godlike Form of Man—is not that the germ of Christianity itself?

Carlyle, Heroes and Hero-Worship, I.

hero-worshiper (hē-rō-wēr'ship-ēr), n. One who pays reverence to, or who entertains extravagant admiration for, a hero or heroes.

But all women rave about him; for women are all hero-worshippers.

Scriven's Mag., III. 632.

herp. An abbreviation of herpetology.

herpes (hēr'pēz), n. [= F. herpès (OF. herpet, m. herpete, f.) = Sp. herpe = Pg. herpes = It. erpete, < L. herpes, < Gr. hērps (hērps), herpes, lit. a creeping (so called from the tendency of the eruption to creep or spread from one part of the skin to another), < ērtēw = L. serpere, creep: see serpent.] 1. A cutaneous affection, also occurring sometimes on mucous membranes, characterized by the appearance of patches of distinct vesicles. Several forms of herpes are named, of which the principal are those given below.—2. [cap.] [NL.] In entom., a genus of weevils, of the family Curculionidae, having as type H. porcellos, of Asiatic Turkey. Bedel, 1874.—Herpes facialis or labialis, herpes on the face, especially about the mouth, unaccompanied by neuralgia, and occurring in many acute febrile diseases; cold-sores.—Herpes zoster, herpes coinciding with the distribution of a sensory nerve, and accompanied by neuralgia, usually severe. The name originated in the resemblance to a girdle in cases of intercostal herpes zoster, but is used for the same disease when it occurs elsewhere. Also called shingles, zoma, and zoster.

Herpestes (hēr-pēs'tēz), n. [NL., appar. < Gr. hērps, a reptile, < ērtēw, creep (see herpes), but said to be (irreg.) < hērps (hērps), a reptile, serpent, < ērtēw, eat, devour. Cf. Spermestes, with similar termination.] The typical genus of ichneumons or mongoses of the subfamily Herpestina, formerly including the whole group, now restricted to such species as the Egyptian ichneumon or Pharaoh's rat (H. ichneumon), the mongoose of India (H. griseus), and several others. Illiger, 1811. See cut under ichneumon.

Herpestidae (hēr-pēs'tī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Herpestes + -idae.] The ichneumons rated as a family. See Herpestina.

Herpestina (hēr-pēs'tī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Herpestes + -ina.] The dog-footed or cynopodous carnivorous quadrupeds of the old world, of the family Viverridae, represented by the ichneumon and mongooses, having straight toes with blunt non-retractile claws. When the group is raised to the rank of a family, the Herpestinae become still more restricted by the exclusion of such genera as Cynictis, Rhinogale, and Crossarchus, as respectively types of different subfamilies; but even in this narrow sense of the term the group contains upward of a dozen genera besides Herpestes, and the species are numerous.

Herpestis (hēr-pēs'tis), n. [NL. (Gärtner, 1805), < Gr. ἑρπῆστις, a reptile: see Herpestes.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, of the natural order Scrophulariaceae, tribe Gratioleae. It is distinguished by its calyx, the upper segment of which is large, ovate, and covering the rest, the other lobes narrow or linear, its cylindrical corolla, 4 stamens, and 2- or 4-valved capsule. It embraces about 50 species of small herbs, creeping or prostrate, with opposite, entire, or toothed leaves, and yellow, blue, or white flowers, mostly in axillary clusters or solitary. They are natives of the warm parts of both hemispheres. H. Moniera, a wide-spread species, is the common water-hyssop, the expressed juice of which is used by the natives of India, when mixed with petroleum, to rub on parts affected with rheumatic pains. H. colubrina is a native of Peru, where it is called yerva de colubra; it is used as a remedy for the bites of venomous animals.

herpetic (hēr-pet'ik), a. [= F. herpétique = Sp. herpético = Pg. herpético = It. erpetico, < Gr. ἑρπῆς (ἐρπῆς), herpes: see herpes.] Pertaining to or resembling herpes; partaking of the nature of herpes: as, herpetic patches.—Herpetic fever, see *fever*¹.

herpetical (hēr-pet'i-kal), a. [herpetic + -al.] Same as herpetic.

herpetism (hēr-pe-tizm), n. [herpes (herpet-) + -ism.] A constitutional tendency to herpes or similar affections. Thomas, Med. Diet.

Herpetodryas (hēr-pe-to-dri'as), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑρπετόν, a reptile, serpent (see herpetoid), + δρύς, a dryad, < δρῦς, a tree: see dryad.] A notable genus of ordinary colubrine serpents, usually referred to the family Colubridae, having an elongate slender form adapted to arboreal life, and greenish and brownish coloration. H. carolinensis is a South American species.

herpetoid (hēr-pe-to'id), a. [Gr. ἑρπετόν, a reptile, serpent (< ἑρπεω = L. serpere, creep: see serpent), + εἶδος, form.] Resembling a reptile; reptiliform; saurid: as, the archæopteryx is a herpetoid bird.

herpetologic (hēr-pe-tō-loj'ik), a. [herpetology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to herpetology.

herpetological (hēr-pe-tō-loj'i-kal), a. [herpetologic + -al.] Same as herpetologic.

herpetologically (hēr-pe-tō-loj'i-kal-i), adv. In the manner or view of a herpetologist.

Dr. Günther considers that herpetologically Egypt must be included in the Palearctic region, and many of the Egyptian snakes occur in Palestine.

Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 320.

herpetologist (hēr-pe-to-lō'j-ist), n. [herpetology + -ist.] One versed in herpetology, or engaged in the study of it.

The alleged monster does not fit into the existing classification of the herpetologists. The American, XII. 325.

herpetology (hēr-pe-to-lō'j-i), n. [Gr. ἑρπετόν, a reptile, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of reptiles, in a broad sense—that is, of reptiles proper and batrachians; the natural history of reptiles.—2. Reptiles collectively: as, the herpetology of Borneo.

When we consider the serpents of New Guinea more in detail, we shall be again struck with the resemblances which they present to the herpetology of Australia.

Nineteenth Century, XX. 88.

Also, erroneously, erpetology.

Herpetospondylia (hēr-pe-tō-spon-dil'i-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑρπετόν, a reptile, + σπῳδύλος, Ionic and common dial. form of Gr. σφῳδύλος, a vertebra, joint.] One of the major groups into which Reptilia (excepting Pleurospondylia) are divisible, including the orders Plesiosauria, Lacertilia, and Ophidia, in all of which the dorsal vertebrae have transverse processes which are either entire or very imperfectly divided into terminal facets. The dorsal vertebrae and ribs are movable upon one another, and there is no plastron. The group thus defined is contrasted on the one hand with Perospondylia and on the other with Suchospondylia. See these words, and also Pleurospondylia.

Herpetotheres (hēr-pe-tō-thér'ez), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑρπετόν, a reptile, + θῆρ, hunt, < θῆρ, a wild beast.] A genus of South American hawks, the type and only species of which is H. cachinnans. Vieillot, 1818.

herpetotomist (hēr-pe-to-tō'tō-mist), n. [herpetotomy + -ist.] A dissector of reptiles; a herpetological anatomist.

herpetotomy (hēr-pe-tō'tō-mi), n. [Gr. ἑρπετόν, a reptile, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνω, ταίνω, cut.] The dissection of reptiles; a branch of zoölogy which treats of the anatomy of reptiles.

herpolhode (hēr-pol'hōd), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἑρπεῖν, creep, + πόλος, pole, + ὁδός, way.] In math., a plane curve described by the point of contact with the fixed plane of an ellipsoid, the center of which is fixed while the ellipsoid rolls upon the plane. It is a curve (commonly, but incorrectly, said to be wavy) circumscribed between two circles, and was invented by Poinson.

herr (her), n. [G. = D. heer = Dan. Sw. herre, similarly used: see herrel.] Lord; master: used in German as a title of respectful or conventional address, either prefixed to the name like the equivalent Mister (Mr.) in English, as Herr Braun, Mr. Brown, or without the name and usually with the possessive pronoun 'my', as mein Herr, literally 'my lord', equivalent to English sir, or plural meine Herren, equivalent to English gentlemen. The Dutch form heer is similarly used. See mynheer.

herre¹, n. [ME. herre, hære, here, hery, < AS. herra, hierra, hearra, heorra (occurring 27 times, only in poetry, and chiefly in a part of the poems ascribed to Caedmon thought to be founded on an OS. original, the word being in AS. and Scand. imported from the HG. and the LG. of the continent) = OS. herro = OFries. hëra, hër = D. heer = MLG. here, ere, LG. heer = OHG. herro, hër, MHG. hërre, herre, hère, G. herr = Icel. harri, a lord, king, hera = Sw. Dan. herre, lord, master, gentleman, as a title, sir, Mr., orig. in ref. to a superior, usually with a poss. pron. preceding (OHG. min, din, sîn, unsar, etc., hërro, so AS. min, thin, his, etc., hearra), chiefly of the first person (OHG. mîn herro, MHG. mein herre, G. mein herr, D. mijn heer = Dan. Sw. min herre, equiv. to E. sir in address: see herr). The OHG. form also appears as hërro, hërero, being orig. compar. of hër, eminent, distinguished, famous, MHG. hër, G. hehr, eminent, distinguished, proud, happy, sacred, = MLG. here, high, solemn, holy, = OS. hër, high, eminent, sacred, agreeing phonetically, and it seems historically, with AS. hâr, ME. hore, E. hoar, = Icel. harr, gray (usually with age).] 1. A lord; master; chief.

Heo brouhten hyme to Pylates, that we here herre.

Old Eng. Miscellany (ed. Morris), p. 46.
This lond ich hebbe here so fre that to none herre y schal abyue.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 102.

2. A knight. [Rare and poetical.]

Many wounds that wrought, wete ye for sothe,
Bothe on horse & on here harmy full mekul.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 6188.

[In both senses only in early Middle English use.]

herre², n. See *har*¹.

herregrundite (hēr-en-grun'dit), n. [Gr. Herregrund (see def.) + -ite.] A basic copper sulphate occurring at Herregrund in Hungary, in spherical groups of scale-like crystals having a bright-green color.

Herreria (hēr-rē'ri-ä), n. [NL., named after C. A. de Herrera, a Spanish agriculturist.] A small genus of liliaceous plants, of the tribe Luguriaceae, the type of Endlicher's subtribe Herrericeae. They are natives of extratropical South America, and are undershrubs with tuberos rootstock, climbing stems, and small scented flowers in many-flowered racemes.

Herrericeae (hēr-ē-rī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Herreria + -ae.] A subtribe of Smilacaceae established by Endlicher, typified by the genus Herreria: the Herrericeae of Kunth, now referred to the Liliaceae.

herriert, n. [ME. herier; < *herry*² + *-er*¹.] One who praises; a worshiper.

Hien dydde thes aspyngly, that he dystruye alle the heryeris of Baal.
Wyclif, 4 [2] Kl. x. 19 (Oxf.).

herring (her'ing), n. [Early mod. E. also hering; < ME. hering, < AS. haring (= D. haring = MLG. harink, herink = OHG. harinc, herinc, MHG. herinc, G. hering, haring) (NL. harengus, F. hareng, from the G. form), a herring; prob. < here (= OHG. hari, heri, etc.), an army, a host (see harry, harbor), etc., + -ing, a suffix common as a patronymic. The reference is to the fact that herrings move in shoals; so W. ysgadan, herrings, < cad, an army, a host.] A clupeoid fish, Clupea harengus, of great economic importance and commercial value. It has an elongate form, and rather loose scales averaging about 57 transverse rows. The vomer has an ovate patch of teeth; the ventral serratures are weak; the color is bluish above and on the scales, varied with bright reflections. The herring inhabits the North Atlantic, especially in water of moderate depth. It is generally found not far from the coast, and in summer it comes into shallow water in countless myriads for the purpose of spawning. The spawning season varies according to temperature; in the Gulf of St. Lawrence it occurs in the spring, off the coast of Maine in September, at Cape Cod in November, and off Block Island in December. In Europe the visits of the herring to the shores depend likewise on temperature, and various regions have special varieties differing in size and slight structural characters. It is the object of very profitable fisheries, especially on the Norwegian, Dutch, and British coasts. The eggs are very small, and are discharged at the bottom of the water, where they adhere to rocks and seaweed, being scattered singly or in bunches over a vast extent of sea-bottom. The number of eggs to a female varies according to size, but averages about 10,000—in very large females many more. A closely related species, C. mirabilis, is found in equal abundance in the North Pacific. The name is extended to the herring family, including the Clupeidae, or shad, alewife, menhaden, pilchard, sprat, sardine, etc.—Black herring, a trade-name for a particular kind of cured fish.—Branch herring, the alewife, Clupea vernalis. See cut under alewife.—California herring, Clupea mirabilis, of the Pacific coast of North America.—Egyptian herring, a local English name of the saury.—Fall herring, Clupea mediocris, without vomerine teeth or jaw-teeth and with the lower jaw quite prominent, rather common along the Atlantic coast of the United States from Florida to the Bay of Fundy, and of little economic value.—Fresh-water herring. See fresh-water.—Full herring, a local English name of the herring with fully developed roe or milk.—Garrie-herring. See garrie.—Green herring, a fresh herring. [Eng.]—King of the herrings. Same as herring-king.—Kipperd herring, an English name of herring split, slightly salted, and smoked.—Lake-herring, the cisco, Coregonus hoyi. Corresponding groups of hesperians are named Hesperidae, Hesperidæ, Hesperides, and Hesperidæ.

Hesperinæ (hes-pe-rin'-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hesperia (-in) + -æ.] A section of the Cruciferae, established by Reichenbach in 1837, typified by the genus Hesperis.

Hesperis (hes'pé-ris), n. [L., the queen's gillyflower, < Gr. ἑσπερίς, the night-scented gillyflower, peculiar fem. of ἑσπέριος, western: see Hesperian and Hesperides.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, founded by Linnaeus, belonging to the natural order Cruciferae, tribe Sisymbrieæ. Its main characters are the two erect lobes of the stigma and elongated erect sepals. The genus includes about 22 species of biennial or perennial herbs, with mostly entire, ovate or oblong leaves, and rather large, loosely racemed, variously colored flowers. They grow in Europe and Asia. The common rocket or dame's-violet is H. matronalis, a native of Europe; other species are also called rocket.

Hesperisphinges (hes'pé-ri-sfin'-jēz), n. pl. [NL., < Hesperia + sphinx.] In Latreille's system of classification, a division of crepuscular lepidopterous insects, corresponding nearly with the modern families Castniidæ and Agaristidæ: so called from being considered the connecting-link between the sphinxes and the diurnal Lepidoptera by means of the Hesperidae, a family of the latter division.

Hesperomys (hes-per'-ō-mis), n. [NL. (Waterhouse, 1839), < Gr. ἑσπερος, western, and μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus equivalent to the tribe Sigmodontes, consisting of the American Muridæ, or murine rodents. As now restricted, the genus consists of the vesper-mice proper, or the ordinary native mice of America, of medium and small size, lithe form, with large ears and eyes, tail approximately as long as the body, fore feet small, hind feet long with scant-haired or naked 6-tuberculate soles, and the general pelage bicolorous, sleek, and glossy. It is divided by Coles into numerous subgenera, those of North America being Vesperimus, Calomys, Onychomys, and Orzomys. The abundant white-footed deer-mouse, H. leucopus, is a characteristic example. See second cut under deer-mouse.

Hesperopitheci (hes'pé-rō-pi-thē'si), n. pl. [< Gr. ἑσπερος, western, the west, and πίθηκος, an ape.] The platyrrhine or American monkeys collectively: so called in distinction from the catarrhine or old-world Heopitheci. The two divisions are respectively continuous with Platyrrhini and Catarrhini.

hesperopithecine (hes'pé-rō-pi-thē'sin), a. Pertaining to the Hesperopitheci.

Hesperornis (hes-pe-rō-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑσπερος, western, the west, and ὄρνις, a bird.] The typical genus of fossil birds of the family Hesperornithidæ. The best-known species is H. regalis, discovered in 1870 in the yellow chalk of the pteranodon beds of Kansas. O. C. Marsh, 1872.

Hesperornis may be tersely characterized as a gigantic diver, some six feet in length from the point of the bill to the end of the toes. . . . While the general configuration of the skeleton may be likened to that of a loon, the conformation of the sternum is ratlike, like that of struthious birds, and the wings are rudimentary or abortive; . . . the jaws are long and furnished with sharp recurved teeth implanted in grooves.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 826.

Hesperornithidæ (hes'pé-rō-r-nith-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hesperornis (-ornith) + -idæ.] A family of fossil birds from the Cretaceous of North America, typified by the genus Hesperornis, and representing a prime division of the whole class Aves, having teeth implanted in grooves, saddle-shaped or heterocœlous vertebrae, ratlike sternum, rudimentary wings, and short tail: continuous with the subclass Odontolece.

Hesperus (hes'pé-rus), n. [L., the evening star, < Gr. Ἑσπερος, the evening star, prop. adj. (with or without δσθηρ, star), of or at evening (also as noun, ἑσπερος or fem. ἑσπερα, evening), hence western; orig. Ἑσπερος* = L. vesper, m., vespera, f., evening: see vesper.] 1. The evening star; especially, the planet Venus as evening star (as morning star, called by the Greeks Phosphoros, and by the Romans Lucifer, 'light-bringer'): in mythology, personified as a son of Astræus and Eos (Aurora), or a son or brother of Atlas, and sometimes called the "father of the Hesperides." Also, poetically, Hesper.

Now glowed the firmament
With living sapphires; Hesperus, that led
The stary host, rode brightest.
Milton, P. L., iv. 605.

At evening the dewy Hesperus comes from the bosom of the mist, and assumes his station in the sky.
Longfellow, Hyperion, iii. 8.

2. [NL.] In entom., a genus of Staphylinidae or rove-beetles. They are allied to Philonthus, but have thoracic setae far from the margin, the lateral fold wide and short, and the metasternum strongly projecting in front in the form of a triangle. The European H. rufipennis and the North American H. laticornis are typical examples. The genus was founded by Fausl in 1874.

Hesselbachian (hes-el-bak'i-an), a. Pertaining to the anatomist F. K. Hesselbach (1759-1816).—Hesselbachian triangle, a triangular space in the lower abdominal walls on each side, concerned in direct inguinal hernia, bounded below by Poupart's ligament, outwardly by the epigastric artery, and inwardly by the border of the rectus muscle.

Hesse's equation. See equation.

Hessian¹ (hesh'an), a. and n. [Gr. Hesia, Latinized form of G. Hesse, Hessen, orig. a Teut. tribe-name, in L. Chatti (Tacitus), Gr. Χάττοι (Strabo).] 1. a. Relating or pertaining to Hesse in Germany, or to the Hessians.—Hessian bit. See bit.—Hessian boots. See boot.—Hessian crucible, fly, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Hesse in Germany. The Hessians as a race are the representatives of the ancient Teutonic people the Catti (Chatti); they formed various minor states in Germany, of which the chief have been Hesse-Cassel (annexed to Prussia in 1866) and the grand duchy of Hesse, called Hesse-Darmstadt previous to 1866.

2. In the United States, as a term of reproach, a mercenary; a military or political hireling: from the employment of Hessian troops as mercenaries by the British government in the American revolution.—3. pl. A kind of long boots originally worn by Hessian soldiers; Hessian boots.

Directly the Stranger saw the young men, he acted at them, eyeing them solemnly over his gilt volume as he lay on the stage-bank, showing his hand, his ring, and his Hessians. Thackeray, Pendennis, iv.

4. pl. A kind of coarse cloth, made of hemp, or, in modern times, of a mixture of hemp and jute, and used principally for bagging.

Close textures, hessians.

U. S. Cons. Rep., No. 73½ (1887), p. 193.

Hessian² (hes'ian), n. [Gr. Hesse (see def.) + -ian.] In math., a functional determinant whose constituents are the second differential coefficients of a quantity, arranged in regular order. The name was given by Sylvester in 1853, after Dr. Otto Hesse of Königsberg, who showed the importance of this determinant. It is the Jacobian to the differential coefficients of a homogeneous function of any number of variables.

hessite (hes'it), n. [After G. H. Hess of St. Petersburg (1802-50).] A rare silver telluride occurring in the Altai and elsewhere. Petzite is a variety containing also some gold.

hessonite (hes'on-it), n. [Also, less prop., essonite; < Gr. ἡσών, less, compar., with superl. ἡσώτος (see hekistotherm), going with μικρός, little, or κακός, bad, < ἡκα, softly.] A variety of garnet: same as cinnamon-stone.

hest (hest), n. [ME. hest, heste (with excrement t, as in against, whilst, etc., and with consequent shortening of the vowel), < AS. hæst, a command, hest (cf. behæst, behest; see behest), < hātan, bid, order, command: see hight.] 1. A command; bidding; injunction; behest. [Poetical or archaic.]

To the ten hestis y haue not tende

Thorugh slouthe, wrahtthe, & glotenie,

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

Mar. What have you done?

Scath. Obeyed your hests, madam; done your commands.

B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, ii. 2.

Female attendance shall obey

Your hest, for service or array.

Scott, L. of the L., vi. 10.

2t. A promise.

To the land of hest that than was hight.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 74.

She nyl hire heste broken for no wight.

Chaucer, Troilus, v. 355.

hestern (hes'tern), a. [= OF. esterne, hesterne, < L. hesternus, of yesterday, yesterday's (= E. yester- in yesterday, etc.), < heri, yesterday: see yester, yesterday.] Of yesterday; yester-.

If a chronicler should misreport exploits that were enterprised hestern day. Holinshed, Hist. Ireland.

hesternal (hes-ter'nal), a. [Gr. hestern + -al.] Of or pertaining to yesterday. [Rare.]

I rose by candle-light, and consumed, in the intensest application, the hours which every other individual of our party wasted in enervating slumbers from the hesternal dissipation or debauch. Bulwer, Pelham, lvii.

hesthogenous (hes-thoj'e-nus), a. [Irreg. (more prop. esthogenous*) < Gr. ἔσθη, dress, clothing (< ἐσθίω, dress, clothe), + γένος, offspring.] In ornith., ptilopædic; covered with down when hatched, as all præcocial and some altricial birds: opposed to gymnogenous or psilopædic.

Hæthogenous—a word so vicious in implication as to be incapable of amendment, but intended to signify those [birds] that were hatched with a clothing of down.

A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 31.

Hesvan, Heshvan (hes'-, hesh'-van), n. [Heb.] The second month of the Jewish civil year, and the eighth of the sacred year, corresponding to the latter part of October and a part of November. It has 29 or 30 days.

Hesyasm (hes-i-kazm), n. [Gr. ἡσυχασμός, < ἡσυχάζειν, be still or quiet: see Hesyachast.] The doctrine of the Hesyachasts, a doctrine closely akin to that of the Quietists of later times. See Hesyachast.

Hesyachast (hes-i-kast), n. [Gr. ἡσυχαστής, one who leads a still, retired life, a quietist, hermit, < ἡσυχάζειν, be still or quiet, < ἡσυχος, still, quiet.] One of a body of monks who lived on Mount Athos during the fourteenth century, and aimed to attain, by the practice of contemplation and asceticism, entire tranquillity and serenity of mind, and hence supernatural insight and divine light, with knowledge of the Deity. Also Omphalopsychos and Massalian.

hesychastic (hes-i-kas'tik), a. [Gr. ἡσυχαστικός, quieting (as music), also like a hermit, < ἡσυχάζειν, quiet, ἡσυχαστής, a quietist, hermit: see Hesyachast.] Productive or expressive of quietude and serenity of mind.—Hesyachastic episyntetha, in anc. pros., compound or episynthetic meters, the trochaic or iambic dipodies in which are epitritie in form (— — — for — — —, and — — — for — — —). Also called dactylo-epitrities.

het¹ (het). Obsolete or provincial preterit and past participle of heat.

het². Obsolete (Middle English) preterit of hight.

het³ (het), v. A dialectal variant of hit.

hetæra (he-tê'râ), n.; pl. hetærae (-rê). [NL., < Gr. ἑταῖρα, Ionic ἑταῖρη, Epic ἑταῖρη, a female companion; in Attic use opposed to a lawful wife, and so with various shades of meaning from 'concubine' to 'courtesan'; fem. of ἑταῖρος, a companion, comrade, akin to ἑταῖρα, a clansman, kinsman.] In ancient Greece, a woman, particularly a slave or a foreigner, devoted to public or private entertainment, making a profession of flute-playing, dancing, etc., and in some cases rising to high consideration for learning, talents, and the social arts; hence, a courtesan; an avowed concubine or female paramour. At Athens only daughters of full citizens could become, under the law, wives of citizens; thus, Aspasia of Miletus, the accomplished companion of Pericles, was, as a foreigner, classed as a hetæra. Also written hetaira, plural hetairai.

Girls, Hetairai, curious in their art,

Hired animalisms. Tennyson, Lucretius.

Like most philosophers of his age, he [Hutton] coquetted with those final causes which have been named barren virgins, but which might be more fitly termed the hetairæ of philosophy, so constantly have they led men astray.

Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 232.

hetæria (he-tê'ri-ä), n. [L., < Gr. ἑταῖρια, ἑταῖρη, companionship, association, brotherhood, a society; < ἑταῖρος, a companion, comrade: see hetæra.] An association of persons for a common end; specifically [cap.], a secret political society of Greeks, formed about the beginning of the nineteenth century, for the purpose of freeing Greece from the Turkish yoke.

heterio (he-tê'ri-ö), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑταῖρια, a society: see hetæria.] In bot., a collection of distinct indehiscent carpels, either dry upon a fleshy receptacle, as the strawberry, or dry upon a dry receptacle, as the ranunculus, or fleshy upon a dry receptacle, as the raspberry. Also, improperly, heterio, eterio.

heterism (he-tê'rizm), n. [Gr. ἑταῖρισμός, the practice of a hetæra, < ἑταῖρίζειν, to be a hetæra, < ἑταῖρα, hetæra: see hetæra.] Open concubinage; specifically, in anthrop., the practice among some primitive races of common intercourse between the sexes; absence of the institution of marriage, or of lasting union between man and woman. Also written hetairism and, incorrectly, hetarism.

The primitive condition of man socially was one of pure heterism. Sir J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilization, p. 67.

heterist (he-tê'rist), n. [Gr. ἑταῖριστής, one who practises heterism, < ἑταῖρίζειν, to be a hetæra: see hetæria. In def. 2, < Hetæria + -ist.] 1. One who practises heterism.—2. A member of the Greek political society Hetæria. Also written hetairist.

heteristic (het-ê'ris'tik), a. [Gr. ἑταῖριστικός, pertaining to, characterized by, or given to the practice of heterism. Also written hetairistic.

Even our poor relations, the anthropomorphic apes, are not heteristic. Athenæum.

hetærolite (he-tê'rô-lit), n. [So called because associated with chalcophanite; < Gr. ἑταῖρος, a companion, + λίθος, a stone.] An imperfectly known mineral from Franklin Furnace, New Jersey, U. S. It is supposed to be an oxide of zinc and manganese allied to hausmannite.

hetaira, hetairism, etc. See hetæra, etc.

hetchel (hech'el), n. and v. Same as hatchel.

hete¹, n. and v. A Middle English form of heat.

hete², v. See hight.

heteracanth (het'-e-ra-kanth), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ἀκανθα, spine.] In ichth., having asymmetrical dorsal and anal fin-spines, alternately broader on one side than on the other; not homocanth.

heteracmy (het'-e-rak'mi), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ἀκμή, prime, maturity.] Proterogyny: said of flowers in which cross-fertilization is secured by the pistils maturing before the stamens: opposed to synacmy. A. W. Bennett (1870), in Journal of Botany, VIII. 316.

Heteractinida (het'-e-rak-tin'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Heteractis (-in-) + -ida.] Starfishes which have more than five rays: distinguished from Pentactinida.

heteradenic (het'-e-ra-den'ik), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ἀδέν, gland.] Of glandular structure, but abnormally located: as, heteradenic tissue.

Heteralocha (het'-e-ral'ô-kä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + λόχος, spouse.] A genus of New Zealand sturnoid passerine birds, notable for the extraordinary sexual difference in the bill, which is comparatively short and quite straight in the male, and very long and curved in the female. The base of the bill is wattled in both sexes. H. acutirostris is the huia-bird. Cabanis, 1815. Also, improperly, Heterolocha. Also called Neomorpha.

Huia-birds (Heteralocha acutirostris): male, short bill; female, long curved bill.

Heteranthera (het'-e-ran-thê'riä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + NL. anthera, anther.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, founded by Ruiz and Pavon in 1794, belonging to the natural order Pontederiaceæ. It is distinguished by its salverform perianth, 8 stamens with erect anthers, and 1- or imperfectly 3-celled ovary. The genus includes 9 species of aquatic herbs, growing in mud or shallow water, with rounded, long-petioled or linear leaves, and blue, whitish, or yellowish flowers from a narrow spathe. They are all, except one African species, natives of North and South America. H. reniformis, of the eastern United States, is the mud-plantain; it has round kidney-shaped leaves and white flowers.

heterarchy (het'-e-rär-ki), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ἀρχή, rule.] Government by an alien or aliens; foreign rule. Also, erroneously, eterarchy. [Rare.]

It is a joy to think we have a king of our owne. Our owne blood, our owne religion; according to the motto of our princes (Ich Dien): otherwise, next to anarchy is eterarchy. Bp. Hall, Christ and Cesar.

heteratonic (het'-e-ra-tom'ik), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ἄτομος, an atom: see atom.] Composed of atoms of different kinds.

heterauxesis (het'-e-räk-sê'sis), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + αὐξάνω, increase: see auxesis.] In bot., irregular or unsymmetrical growth. It is a condition observed in the apex of growing organs of plants, superinduced by certain irregularities in the conditions upon which growth depends, such as variations in the osmotic properties of the cell-sap, in the physical properties of the primordial utricle, or in those of the cell-wall itself, giving rise to inequalities in the rate of growth of different parts of the organ, which in turn changes the direction of its growth.

The rate of growth is usually not uniform in all parts of the transverse growing zones, so that the growth in length of an organ rarely, if ever, takes place in a straight line, but its apex rotates. This rotation we found to be due to spontaneous variations in the relative rate of growth of opposite sides of the organ, or, to express it in a single word, to spontaneous heterauxesis. Vines, Physiol. of Plants, p. 375.

heterio, n. See heterio.

hetero-. [NL., L., etc., hetero-, < Gr. ἕτερος, combining form of ἕτερος, the other (one of two), also (put loosely for ἄλλος, L. alius) another (of many), also other than usual, different; perhaps reduced from orig. ἕτερος* (?) = Skt. antaras = Goth. anthar = E. other: see *other*¹.] An element in compound words of Greek origin or formation, meaning 'other' or 'different': often opposed to homo-, 'same.'

heteroblastic (het'ē-rō-blas'tik), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + βλαστός, bud, germ.] Having a different histological origin, as when cartilage arises from periosteal cells: opposed to homoblastic.

This new cartilage is either homoblastic or heteroblastic. H. Gadon, Nature, XXXIX. 150.

Heterobranchia (het'ē-rō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + βράχια, gills.] In zool., a classificatory name used in various senses. (a) In Lamarck's system of classification (1801-12), the lower one of two orders of his class Crustacea, containing the branchiopods, isopods, amphipods, etc., as distinguished from the Homobranchia or decapod crustaceans, the cirrripeds being placed in a different class. (b) A section of gastropods with the gills variously formed, exposed or only slightly covered by a fold of the mantle, or contained in a closed lung-like cavity. The species are hermaphrodite. The term was used by Gray for the Ophiopoda, and was by Leuckart (1848) made one of six orders of the class Gasteropoda. (c) De Blainville's name (1826) for the tunicates or ascidians, as the fourth order of his Acephalophora or headless mollusks, divided into two families, Ascidacea, or ordinary sea-squirrels, and Salpacea, or salps. [Not in use.] Also Heterobranchiata.

heterobranchiate (het'ē-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Heterobranchia, in any sense.

Heterocarpeæ (het'ē-rō-kār'pē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + καρπός, fruit.] A class of algae established by Kützinger in 1843, including the tribes Trichoblasteæ and Choristocarpeæ. This classification has not been followed.

heterocarpian (het'ē-rō-kār'pi-ān), a. Same as heterocarpous.

heterocarpous (het'ē-rō-kār'pus), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., bearing fruit of two sorts or shapes.

heterocellular (het'ē-rō-sel'ū-lār), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + NL. cellula, a cell: see cellula.] Consisting of unlike (that is, of variously differentiated or specialized) cells, as most animals: opposed to isocellular.

heterocephalous (het'ē-rō-sef'ā-lus), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κεφαλή, head.] In bot., having some flower-heads male and others female in the same individual: applied principally in the Compositæ.

Heterocera (het'ē-rōs'ē-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κέρας, horn.] A suborder of Lepidoptera, founded by Boisduval (1840), containing the nocturnal lepidoptera or moths: contrasted with Rhopalocera or butterflies. They are so named from the diversity in the forms of the antennæ, which may be setaceous, fusiform, pectinate, or plumose, but are seldom if ever rhopaloceran or clubbed like those of butterflies. Leading forms of Heterocera are the sphingids, bombycids, arctiids, noctuids, geometrids, pyralids, tortricids, and tineids. The group corresponds to the Linnean genera Sphinx and Phalaena; it includes many families, among them those grouped as Microlepidoptera. See moth.

heterocerc (het'ē-rō-sérk), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κέρας, tail.] Same as heterocercal.

heterocercal (het'ē-rō-sér'kal), a. [< heterocerc cercal; inequality of the lobes of the caudal fin: opposed to homocercy.

Heteroceridæ (het'ē-rō-sér'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Heterocerus + -idæ.] A family of clavicorn beetles, typified by the genus Heterocerus. The dorsal segments of the abdomen are partly membranous, the first four ventral segments connate, the tarsal 4-jointed, the antennæ short and irregular, and the legs fossorial. MacLeay, 1825.

heterocerous (het'ē-rōs'ē-rus), a. [< NL. Heterocerus, < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κέρας, horn.] Having diversiform antennæ; pertaining to or having the characters of the Heterocera.

Heterocerus (het'ē-rōs'ē-rus), n. [NL.: see heterocerous.] The typical genus of Heteroceridæ; so named from the irregularity of the 11-jointed antennæ, most of the joints of which form a club. The species are aquatic, burrowing in sand or mud along streams and in marshes by means of their strong fossorial legs.

Heterochelæ (het'ē-rō-kē'lē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + χῆλη, a hoof, claw.] In Latreille's system of classification, a division of crabs, containing those whose claws are longer in the male than in the female: contrasted with Homochelæ. It was composed of three tribes, Orbiculata, Trigona, and Hypophthalma. See these words.

Heterochromææ (het'ē-rō-kró'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + χρῶμα, color: see heterochromous, + -ææ.] A subtribe of Compositæ, characterized by having the disk hermaphrodite and mostly fertile, the corolla yellow or rarely cream-color, sometimes changing to purple, the rays not yellow, wanting in certain species, and a naked receptacle. It includes Aster, Erigeron, Boltonia, and allied genera.

heterochromous (het'ē-rō-kró'mus), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + χρῶμα, color.] In bot., having different members unlike in color; also, having the florets of the center or disk different in color from those of the circumference or ray: applied to a flower-head in the Compositæ.

heterochronia (het'ē-rō-kró'ni-ā), n. [NL.] Same as heterochrony.

Perls has suggested the use of the word heterotopia to designate a local heterology, and heterochronia a heterology in point of time, as when mucous tissue or cartilage develops in a place where it should normally only appear in the embryonic period.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 401.

heterochronic (het'ē-rō-kron'ik), a. [< heterochronous + -ic.] Same as heterochronous.

heterochronism (het'ē-rō-kró'nizm), n. [< heterochronous + -ism.] Same as heterochrony.

heterochronistic (het'ē-rō-kró'nis'tik), a. [< heterochronous + -ist + -ic.] Same as heterochronous.

heterochronous (het'ē-rō-kró'nus), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different times, + χρόνος, time.] Appearing at different times; not in genetic sequence; of or pertaining to heterochrony.

heterochrony (het'ē-rō-kró'ni), n. [< NL. heterochronia, < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different times: see heterochronous.] In biol., a displacement, with reference to their order of appearance in time, of members of a genetically connected series, as of animal forms or organs; a disarrangement of the true ontogenetic sequence.

Entire organs which, during the serial genesis of the type, came comparatively late, come in the evolving individual comparatively soon. This, which Prof. Haeckel has called heterochrony, is shown us in the early marking out of the brain in a mammalian embryo, though in the lowest vertebrate animal no brain ever exists.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 233.

Heterocladia (het'ē-rō-kla'di-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κλάδος, branch.] A monotypic genus of marine algae, placed by Agardh in the order Rhodomeleæ, tribe Dasyeæ. H. australis, the only species, is a native of New Holland. It has flat fronds composed of three layers of loose cellular tissue.

Heterocladieæ (het'ē-rō-kla'di'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Heterocladia + -ææ.] A tribe of marine algae founded by Decaisne (1842), typified by the genus Heterocladia: placed by Agardh in the tribe Dasyeæ. See Heterocladia.

heterocline (het'ē-rō-klīn), a. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κλίμα, bed (receptacle): see clinic.] In bot., producing the two kinds of heads on separate receptacles: nearly synonymous with heterocephalous.

heteroclit (het'ē-rō-klit), a. [< heteroclitæ + -al.] Same as heteroclitæ.

heteroclitæ (het'ē-rō-klit), a. and n. [= F. heteroclitæ = Sp. Pg. heteroclitæ = It. eteroclitæ, < LL. heteroclitus, < Gr. ἑτερόκλιτος, irregularly inflected, < ἕτερος, other, different, + κλίσις (in comp.), verbal adj. of κλίνειν, bend, incline, decline, inflect, = E. *lean*¹: see clinic and *lean*¹.] 1. a. 1. In gram., irregular in inflection. Hence — 2. Deviating from ordinary forms or rules; irregular; anomalous. [Rare.]

Sir Toby Matthews, one of those heteroclitæ animals who finds his place anywhere.

Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, II. iii.

II. n. 1. In gram., a word which is irregular or anomalous in declension or conjugation, or which deviates from the ordinary forms of inflection in words of a like kind. It is applied particularly to nouns having forms from different stems. Hence — 2. A person or thing that deviates from the regular or proper form. [Rare.]

A substantial and severe collection of the heteroclitæ or irregulars of nature, well examined and described, I find not. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 121.

There are strange heteroclitæ in religion nowadays.

Howell, Letters, iv. 35.

It is a just and general complaint that indexes for the most part are heteroclitæ — I mean either redundant in what is needless, or defective in what is needful.

Fuller, Worthies, Norfolk.

heteroclitic (het'ē-rō-klit'ik), a. and n. [< heteroclitæ + -ic.] Same as heteroclitæ.

heteroclitical (het'ē-rō-klit'ikal), a. [< heteroclitic + -al.] Same as heteroclitæ.

Of sins heteroclitical, and such as want either name or precedent, there is oftentimes a sin even in their histories. Sir T. Broune, Vulg. Err., iv. 19.

heteroclitous (het'ē-rō-klit'us), a. [< LL. heteroclitus: see heteroclitæ.] Same as heteroclitæ.

heterocyst (het'ē-rō-sist), n. [< Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κύστις, a bag, pouch.] In bot., one of a class of abnormal cells found in algae of the order Nostocaceæ. In the genus Nostoc, which may be taken as the type, the plants consist of rounded cells, loosely joined together in filaments, and usually embedded in a gelatinous jelly. At irregular intervals in the filaments certain larger clear cells, the heterocysts, are produced. These heterocysts have differently colored watery cell-contents, and seem incapable of further development. They are probably connected in some way with reproduction, but their real nature is unknown. According to Farlow ("Marine Algae of New England," p. 180), the term has been wrongly applied to certain of the basal cells of some of the species of Melobesia, the organs not being homologous.

heterodactyl, heterodactyle (het'ē-rō-dak'til), a. [< NL. heterodactylus, < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + δάκτυλος, a finger or toe.] Having the digits irregular or peculiar in size, form, or position. Also heterodactylus.

Heterodactylæ (het'ē-rō-dak'ti-lē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of heterodactylus: see heterodactyl.] In ornith., a group of picarian birds, distinguished from all other zygodactyl birds by having the second instead of the fourth toe reversed; the trogons, of the family Trogonidae, considered as a superfamily. Scatter, 1880.

Heterodactyli (het'ē-rō-dak'ti-li), n. pl. [NL., pl. of heterodactylus: see heterodactyl.] 1. In Blyth's system of classification (1849), the third division of his Streptopodes, divided into the Trogonoides and Cypseloides, the former consisting of the trogons alone, the latter of the goatsuckers, swifts, and humming-birds. — 2. Same as Heterodactylæ. See heteropelmous.

heterodactylous (het'ē-rō-dak'ti-lus), a. [< NL. heterodactylus: see heterodactyl.] 1. Same as heterodactyl. — 2. In ornith., having that arrangement of the digits which is peculiar to trogons; of or pertaining to the Heterodactyli.

Heterodactylus (het'ē-rō-dak'ti-lus), n. [NL.: see heterodactyl.] 1. A genus of reptiles. Spir., 1825. — 2. A genus of coleopterous insects. Guérin, 1841.

Heterodermeæ (het'ē-rō-dēr'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + δέρμα, skin, + -ææ.] An order of the Myxomycetes or slime-molds, proposed by Rostafinski in 1873. They are characterized by having the sporangia without capitulum, columella, or lime; the sporangium-wall delicate, and the spores and thickenings of the inner wall in one and the same sporangium usually of uniform color.

Heterodon (het-ter'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + ὄντις (ὄντιν) = E. tooth.]

1. A genus of innocuous colubiform serpents, having the rostral plate enlarged and recurved. There are several North American species, chiefly known as hog-nosed snakes, as H. simus or H. platyrhinus. They are unsightly blotched reptiles, Hog-nosed Snake (Heterodon platyrhinus).

Heterocercal Tail of Fish.

+ -al.] In icht., having an unequally divided tail or caudal fin. Contrasted with homocercal.

heterocercality (het'ē-rō-sér'kal'i-ti), n. [< heterocercal + -ity.] Same as heterocercy. Science, V. 341. [Rare.]

Heterocerci (het'ē-rō-sér'si), n. pl. [NL. (Zittel, 1887), < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + κέρας, tail.] An order of ganoid fishes, including the families Palæoniscidæ and Platysomidæ: same as Lysopleri.

heterocercy (het'ē-rō-sér'si), n. [< heterocerc + -y.] The state or quality of being heterowith flattened heads, strikingly similar to some venomous serpents, as the copperhead or moccasin, but are perfectly harmless. Palisot du Beauvois, 1799.

2. [l. c.] A serpent of the genus Heterodon. Also heterodont.—3. One of several genera of mammals and mollusks. [Not in use.]

heterodont (het'e-rō-dont), a. and n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ὄντος (ōntos) = E. tooth.] I. a. Having different kinds of teeth; having the teeth differentiated into several distinct kinds, as incisors, canines, and molars: opposed to homodont.

In most cases . . . animals with Heterodont dentition are also Diphyodont. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 352.

II. n. 1. A heterodont animal.—2. Same as heterodon, 2.

Heterodonta (het'e-rō-dont'ā), n. pl. [NL.: see heterodont.] A section or order of dimyarian bivalve mollusks, with the few hinge-teeth distinctly separated as cardinal and lateral, alternating, and exactly fitting into pits in the opposite valve. It includes a large majority of living bivalves, as Veneridae, Unionidae, and many related families.

Heterodontia (het'e-rō-dont'shi-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see heterodont.] In Blyth's edition of Cuvier, an order of implacental mammals, corresponding to the marsupials or pouched mammals. [Not in use.]

Heterodontidae (het'e-rō-dont'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Heterodontus + -idae.] Same as Cestraciontidae.

heterodontoid (het'e-rō-dont'oid), a. [Gr. ἑτερόντος + -oid.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Heterodontidae.

Heterodontus (het'e-rō-dont'tus), n. [NL.: see Heterodon.] 1. Same as Cestracion.—2. A genus of nitidulid beetles. Murray.

heterodox (het'e-rō-doks), a. and n. [= F. hétérodoxe = Sp. Pg. heterodoxo = It. eterodosso, < Gr. ἑτερόδοξος, of another or different opinion, hence holding opinions other than the 'right' ones (opposed to ὀρθόδοξος, orthodox), < ἔρεπος, other, different, + δόξα, opinion: see doxology.] I. a. 1. In theol., holding opinions not in accord with some generally recognized standard of doctrine, such as the creed of a church or the decrees of councils; not orthodox; heretical.

He asserted that I was heterodox: I returned to the charge. Goldsmith, Vicar, II.

Hence, in general.—2. Not in accord with the established standard of belief.

This opinion will, we fear, be considered as heterodox. Macaulay, On History.

II. † n. An opinion not in accord with that which is generally accepted; a peculiar view.

On Thursday morning we had another session, in which was nothing done, but that it was reasoned whether that last heterodox should be retained.

Hales, Golden Remains, Balcanquhall's Letter from the [Synod of Dort, etc.]

Not only a simple heterodox, but a very hard paradox it will seem, and of great absurdity. . . . If we say attraction is unjustly appropriated unto the loadstone.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 3.

heterodoxly (het'e-rō-doks-li), adv. In a heterodox manner.

heterodoxness (het'e-rō-doks-nes), n. The character of being heterodox.

heterodoxy (het'e-rō-dok-si), n. [= F. hétérodoxie = Sp. Pg. heterodoxia = It. eterodosia, < Gr. ἑτερόδοξία, error of opinion, < ἑτερόδοξος, of another opinion: see heterodox.] 1. The quality or state of being heterodox: as, the heterodoxy of a doctrine, book, or person.

Heterodoxy was to a Jew but another name for disloyalty. Bp. Hurd, Works, VI. xx.

2. A heterodox belief or doctrine; a departure from an established standard or principle; a heresy.

Pelagianism and Samianism, with several other heterodoxies. South, Sermon to University of Oxford, Dec.

"I have heard frequent use," said the late Lord Sandwich, in a debate on the Test Laws, "of the words orthodoxy and heterodoxy; but I confess myself at a loss to know precisely what they mean." "Orthodoxy, my Lord," said Bishop Warburton, in a whisper—"orthodoxy is my doxy—heterodoxy is another man's doxy."

Quoted in Priestley's Memoirs, I. 572.

heterodromous (het'e-rōd'rō-mus), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + δρόμος, a running, < δραμειν, run.] Running or lying in different directions, as leaves on the stem and branches.—Heterodromous lever, a lever the fulcrum of which is between the weight and the power.

heterodromy (het'e-rōd'rō-mi), n. [As heterodromous + -y.] In bot., a difference in direction of the genetic spiral in branch and parent axis: same as antidromy. Goebel.

heterocious (het-e-rō'shus), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + οἶκος, a house.] Pertaining to, or characterized by heterocism.

heterocism (het-e-rō'sizm), n. [As heterocious + -ism.] In mycology, the development of different stages of the same growth on different host-plants; the production of the ascospores or conidia of a fungus on one host, and of its uredospores and teleutospores on another. One of the commonest examples is that afforded by the rust (Puccinia graminis) of wheat, oats, and some of the cultivated grasses. (See cut under Puccinia.) The first stage is passed upon the leaves of the barberry, where it constitutes what is known as the barberry-clustercup, or barberry-rust, Æcidium Berberidis. Later in the season, and usually after the rust has disappeared from the barberry, the uredo-stage makes its appearance upon the stem and leaves of wheat, oats, etc. The uredospores are soon produced, and by their rapid germination spread the disease until the whole of the host-plant may be more or less affected. In the fall the teleutospores are produced, which, lasting over the winter, germinate in the spring only upon the barberry-leaves, and begin again the cycle of growth.

heterocismal (het'e-rō'siz-mal), a. [Gr. heterocism + -al.] In a heterocism manner; passing through different stages, or producing different kinds of spores, on different host-plants.

heterogamous (het-e-rōg'a-mus), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + γάμος, marriage.] In bot., bearing two kinds of flowers which differ sexually, as in most Compositae and many Cyperaceae. In the Compositae the ray-flowers of the capitulum or head may be either neuter or female, and those of the disk male. In the Cyperaceae the male and female flowers are frequently borne in different spikes from the same root, or in different parts of the same spike.

heterogamy (het-e-rōg'a-mi), n. [As heterogamous + -y.] The state or quality of being heterogamous; mediate or indirect fertilization of plants. See extract under Chermes.

One or more generations of sexually produced young is now called heterogamy. Nature, XXX. 67.

Heterogangliata (het'e-rō-gang-gli-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of heterogangliatus*: see heterogangliate.] A name proposed by Professor Owen for all the Mollusca of Cuvier except the cirripeds, in accordance with a scheme of classification founded on the nervous system.

heterogangliate (het'e-rō-gang-gli-āt), a. [NL. heterogangliatus, < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + γάγγλιον, ganglion.] Possessing a nervous system in which the ganglia are scattered and unsymmetrical, as mollusks; specifically, of or pertaining to the Heterogangliata.

heterogone (het'e-rō-jēn), a. [F. hétérogène: see heterogeneous.] Same as heterogeneous.

All the guests are so mere heterogone And strangers, no man knows another.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, II. 1.

heterogeneous (het'e-rō-jē-nē-ā), a. [As heterogene-ous + -al.] Heterogeneous. [Rare.]

This may be true, only in the Blood and Spirits of such Fluid Parts, not in the solid and heterogeneous Parts.

Hewell, Letters, I. 1. 31.

Inanimate substances, as water, wine, flesh, also magnitude, motion, and time, are wholes homogeneous continual; the bodies of animals, heterogeneous continual; numbers, as three, ten, are wholes homogeneous discrete; an army, the church, the world, heterogeneous and of the same denomination. Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

Heterogeneous numbers, numbers having opposite signs. heterogeneity (het'e-rō-jē-nē-ī-ti), n. [= F. hétérogénéité = Sp. heterogeneidad = Pg. heterogeneidade = It. eterogeneità; as heterogene-ous + -ity.] The character or state of being heterogeneous; composition from dissimilar parts; difference in kind or quality; disparateness; dissimilarity.

Heterogeneity of function is the correlate of heterogeneity of structure; and heterogeneity of structure is the leading distinction between organic and inorganic aggregates. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 86.

What a delightful heterogeneity pervades a book-lover's collection, even if it results only from the difference in size of first editions! J. R. Rees, Bookworm, p. 32.

Obviously, as it is through difference that an aggregate increases in heterogeneity, so it is through integration that an aggregate increases in definiteness, of structure and function. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 337.

Law of heterogeneity, the proposition that every concept is susceptible of logical division—that, however minute a description may be, it must always leave room for further distinctions.

heterogeneous (het'e-rō-jē-nē-us), a. [= F. hétérogène = Sp. heterogéneo = Pg. heterogeneo = It. eterogeneo, < ML. heterogeneus, < Gr. ἑτερογενής, of different kinds, in gram. of different genders, < ἑτερος, other, different, + γενος, kind, gender: see genus.] 1. Different in kind; widely dissimilar; unlike; foreign; incongruous.

If there be the least settlement or heterogeneous matter in any part of it [a liquor], shake it thoroughly, and it will be sure to show itself. South, Works, VI. vii.

Courtier and patriot cannot mix Their heterogeneous politics Without an effervescence.

Couper, Friendship, st. 22.

Relatively speaking, a tree is said to be heterogeneous as compared with the seed from which it has sprung; and an orange is heterogeneous as compared with a wooden ball. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 336.

2. Composed of parts of different kinds; having widely unlike elements or constituents: opposed to homogeneous.

By a seemingly careless arrangement of his heterogeneous garb, he had endeavored to conceal or abate the peculiarity. Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, III.

An object is said to be heterogeneous when its parts do not all resemble one another. All known objects are more or less heterogeneous. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 336.

Heterogeneous attraction. (a) An attraction between atoms, depending upon their being different in kind; chemical attraction. (b) The attraction between the different kinds of electricity and magnetism.—Heterogeneous body, a mechanical mixture of different chemical substances; especially, in the theory of attractions and in optics, a body whose parts are of unequal density.—Heterogeneous nouns, in gram., nouns of different genders in the singular and plural: as, Latin locus, a place, which is of the masculine gender in the singular, but either masculine or neuter in the plural.—Heterogeneous number, a number composed of a whole number and a fraction.—Heterogeneous principle, a principle belonging to a different science from the one under consideration; a heteronymous principle.—Heterogeneous quantities, in physics, quantities of different dimensions, as a velocity and an acceleration.—Heterogeneous surds, in math., roots whose indices are different, as a square root and a cube root.

heterogeneously (het'e-rō-jē-nē-us-li), adv. In a heterogeneous manner; so as to be heterogeneous; dissimilarly.

They [the houses] are small, and by the necessity of accumulating stores, where there are so few opportunities of purchase, the rooms are very heterogeneously filled.

Johnson, Jour. to Western Isles.

heterogeneousness (het'e-rō-jē-nē-us-nes), n. The character or condition of being heterogeneous; heterogeneity.

Dissimilitude of style, and heterogeneousness of sentiments, may sufficiently shew that a work does not really belong to the reputed author.

Johnson, Note on Shakespeare's 3 Hen. VI.

heterogenesis (het'e-rō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + γενεσις, generation.] 1. Production by an external cause—that is, a cause different from the effect. Also called heterogeny.—2. In biol.: (a) The spontaneous generation of animals and vegetables low in the scale of organization from inorganic elements; abiogenesis. (b) That kind of generation in which the parent, whether plant or animal, produces offspring differing in structure and habit from itself, but in which after one or more generations the original form reappears. Some forms of heterogenesis are called xenogenesis, parthenogenesis, gonaecogenesis, and alternate generation. See biogenesis, homogenesis.

By the other mode, the living parent was supposed to give rise to offspring which passed through a totally different series of states from those exhibited by the parent, and did not return into the cycle of the parent; this is what ought to be called Heterogenesis, the offspring being altogether and permanently unlike the parent. The term Heterogenesis, however, has unfortunately been used in a different sense, and M. Milne-Edwards has therefore substituted for it Xenogenesis, which means the generation of something foreign. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 358.

heterogenetic (het'e-rō-jē-net'ik), a. [Gr. heterogenesis, after genetic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of heterogenesis, in any sense.

Prof. Wundt calls his own theory of the will "the autogenetic theory," opposing it to the ordinary or "heterogenetic theory." Mind, XII. 239.

heterogenist (het-e-roj'e-nist), n. [Gr. heterogeny + -ist.] One who believes in the theory of spontaneous generation.

heterogeny (het-e-roj'e-ni), n. [Gr. ἑτερογενής, of different kinds: see heterogeneous.] Same as heterogenesis, 1.

Heteroglossa (het'e-rō-glos'sā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + γλῶσσα, tongue: see glossa, 2.] A prime section of scutibranchiate gastropods. They have pellucid teeth in five to eight longitudinal rows and variable in form, the larger ones having opaque black tips; the shell is symmetrical; and the foot has no lateral branch. The group was instituted by J. B. Gray for the families Dentaliidae, Tectariidae, Lepetidae, Patellidae, and Chitonidae, which are distributed by recent authors among three orders.

heterogone (het'e-rō-gōn), a. Same as heterogeneous.

heterogonism (het-e-rōg'ō-nizm), n. [Gr. heterogon-ous + -ism.] The state of being heterogeneous. Also heterogony.

heterogonous (het-e-rōg'ō-nus), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + γόνος, generation.] In bot., having dissimilar reproductive organs: a term proposed by Asa Gray, in 1877, to include such flowers are as dimorphic or trimorphic in regard to the relative length of stamens and pistils. These flowers were first called dioecio-dimorphic by Torrey and Gray, in their "Flora of North America." Darwin, who was the first to interpret correctly the meaning, first termed this kind of blossom simply dimorphic (Jour. Linn. Soc. Lond., 1862, p. 77), but later, in 1877, in his "Forms of Flowers," he adopted Hildebrand's epithet heterostyled for it. These terms are, however, objectionable, since the differences affect the androecium, and even the pollen, as well as the style. Sometimes also heterogonous, heterogone. — Heterogonous dimorphism, the production of two kinds of hermaphrodite flowers by different individuals of the same species, the flowers being essentially similar except in the androecium and gynoecium, but these reciprocally different in length or height, and the adaptations such that, by the agency of insects, the pollen from the stamens of the one sort reciprocally fertilizes the stigma of the other. This dimorphism has been detected in about 40 genera, belonging to 14 or 15 natural orders, widely scattered through the vegetable kingdom. Gray, Struct. Bot., p. 234. — Heterogonous trimorphism, a threefold heterogonism—that is, the occurrence in flowers of three reciprocally relative lengths of stamens and pistils. "The three forms may be conveniently called, from the unequal length of their pistils, the long-styled, mid-styled, and short-styled. The stamens also are of unequal length, and these may be called the longest, mid-length, and shortest." Darwin, Forms of Flowers, p. 133.

heterogony (het'-e-rōg'-ō-ni), n. [As heterogonous + -y.] Same as heterogonism. See heterogonous.

heterographic (het'-e-rō-graf'-ik), a. [heterography + -ic.] Of or pertaining to heterography.

heterography (het'-e-rōg'-ra-fi), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + -γραφία, Gr. γράφειν, write.] Heterogeneous spelling; the use of the same letter or letters with different powers in different positions or in different words, as of c in call and cell, ough in rough, dough, and hough, etc.

Heterogyna (het'-e-rōj'-i-nā), n. [NL., neut. pl. of heterogynus; see heterogynous.] 1. In Latreille's system of classification, the first family of aculeate hymenopterous insects, the ants: so called from the two or three kinds of individuals, as males, females, and neuters: nearly equivalent to the modern families Formicidae, Dorylidae, Poneridae, Myrmicidae, Odontomachidae, and Mutillidae.—2. A group of fossorial hymenopterous insects, or digger-wasps, consisting of the families Mutillidae and Scelidae, thus together contrasted with Fossorae proper.

heterogynal (het'-e-rōj'-i-nal), a. [As heterogynous + -al.] Same as heterogynous.

heterogynous (het'-e-rōj'-i-nus), a. [NL. heterogynus, Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + γυνή, female.] Having the females of two different kinds, one sexual, the other abortive or neuter, as the ants; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Heterogyna.

heteroideous (het'-e-rōi'-de-us), a. [Gr. ἑτεροειδής, of another form or kind, ἑτερος, other, different, + εἶδος, form.] Diversified in form. [Rare.]

Heterolepidæ (het'-e-rō-lep'-i-de), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερόλεπτος, unequal, ἑτερος, other, different, + λεπίς, scale.] In Günther's classification of fishes, same as Chiridae or Hexagrammidae.

heterologous (het'-e-rō-lō'-gus), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + λόγος, proportion, relation. Cf. heterology.] 1. Containing or consisting of different elements or combinations; not homologous.

Homologous forms may occur in parallel series which . . . can be called heterologous in their own series. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., XXIII, 117.

Specifically.—2. In med., consisting of a tissue not normally found in that place at that period of life: as, a heterologous tumor.

The more malignant heterologous tumors were attributed to a change in the blood.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III, 401.

heterology (het'-e-rō-lō'-ji), n. [As heterologous + -y.] Abnormality; want or absence of homology or true morphological affinity; structural difference from a type or normal standard. Thus, cancer-cells exhibit heterology in comparison with healthy tissues.

Perlis has suggested the use of the word heterotopia to designate a local heterology, and heterochronia a heterotopy in point of time, as when mucous tissue or cartilage develops in a place where it should normally only appear in the embryonic period.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III, 401.

heteromallous (het'-e-rō-mal'-us), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μαλλός, a lock of wool.] In bot., having the leaves or branches turned in different directions, like the fibers of wool: applied to mosses. [Rare.]

heteromastigata (het'-e-rō-mas'-ti-gāt), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μαστιγία (μαστιγία), a whip, flagellum, + -ate.] Having flagella of different kinds, a tractellum and a gubernaculum, as an infusorian: distinguished from isomastigata.

Heteromastigida (het'-e-rō-mas-tij'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερομαστιγία (-tig-) + -ida.] A family of cilioflagellate infusorians, represented by the genus Heteromastix. They have a short adoral fringe of cilia, one trailing and one vibratile flagellum, and a distinct anterior mouth close to the bases of the flagella. These animalcules are illoricate and free-swimming, plastic and changeable in form, and inhabit fresh water. The family has also been raised to the rank of an order named Heteromastigoda.

Heteromastix (het'-e-rō-mas'-tik-s), n. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μαστιγία, a whip, scourge.] 1. A genus of coleopterous insects. Boheman, 1858.—2. The typical genus of Heteromastigida, having a fringe of cilia along the ventral surface. H. proteiformis is an example. H. James Clark, 1868.

Heteromeles (het'-e-rō-mē'-lēz), n. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μήλον, apple.] A monotypic genus of plants, belonging to the natural order Rosaceae, and allied to Pyrus and Crataegus. The single species, H. arbutifolia, is a shrub or small tree, with simple, coriaceous, dark, shining, evergreen, sharply serrate leaves, and white flowers in terminal corymbose panicles. It is very ornamental, from the contrast between the abundant bright-red fruit and the dark shining foliage. It is common in the coast ranges of California from Mendocino county to San Diego, and east to the Sierra Nevada, and is known as the toyon and the California holly. The wood is dark reddish-brown in color, very heavy, hard, and close-grained, and susceptible of a beautiful polish.

Heteromera (het'-e-rō-mē'-rā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερομερής, unequal; see heteromerous.] In Latreille's system of classification, a subordinal group of Coleoptera. It includes those beetles which have 4 tarsal joints of the first and second pair of legs, and only 4 such joints of the third pair, and is divided into Melasma, Tazicorines, Stenelytra, and Trachelides. A later division of the Heteromera, by Westwood, is into Trachelida and Atrachelida. Leading families of the former are Meloidæ, Stylopidae, and Anthicidae; most of the latter division consists of the Tenebrionidae.

heteromeran (het'-e-rō-mē'-ran), n. One of the Heteromera; a heteromerous beetle.

Heteromeri (het'-e-rō-mē'-ri), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μῦρος, thigh.] In ornith., in Garrod and Forbes's arrangement, a division of mesomyodian passerines, including the families Cotingidae and Pipridæ, in which the femoral artery is developed contrary to the rule in birds: opposed to Homoemeri.

heteromeric (het'-e-rō-mēr'-ik), a. [As Heteromeri + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Heteromeri; having the disposition of the femoral artery as in the Heteromeri.

heteromerous (het'-e-rō-mē'-rus), a. [Cf. Heteromera; Gr. ἑτερομερής, unequal, ἑτερος, other, different, + μέρος, a part.] Diversiform; variously composed; having a heterologous composition; consisting of heteronomous parts. Specifically.—(a) In entom., having a different number of joints in the different pairs of tarsi; pertaining to or having the characters of the Heteromeri. (b) In chem., unrelated as to chemical composition. (c) In bot.: (1) Of flowers, having the members of adjoining cycles unequal in number. (2) Of lichens, having the gonidia or algal cells disposed within the thallus in one or more distinct layers, thus producing a stratification: opposed to homoeomerous.

The heteromerous thallus occurs in the large majority of species, and displays in fact a structure the main features of which can be clearly defined.

De Barry, Fungi (trans.), p. 402.

Heterometabola (het'-e-rō-me-tab'-ō-lā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + NL. Metabola, q. v.] A division of insects, including the Hemiptera, Orthoptera, Pseudoneuroptera, Physopoda, and Thysanura, which differ in their metamorphoses, but none of which show complete changes from larva to pupa and imago: in contradistinction to the Metabola, which undergo complete metamorphosis. Also called Homo-morpha. Packard.

Heterometabolous (het'-e-rō-me-tab'-ō-lus), a. [As Heterometabola + -ous.] Pertaining to the Heterometabola; characterized by varying metamorphosis.

Heteromita (het'-e-rō-mi'-tā), n. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μίτρος, thread.] The typical genus of infusorians of the family Heteromitidae, of ovate form, without ventral groove. They are very numerous in infusions of animal or vegetable matter in either fresh or salt water. H. lens is one of the longest-known animalcules, having been described as Monas lens by Müller in 1786. There are many others.

Heteromitida (het'-e-rō-mi'-tā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερομίτιδα + -ida.] A family of flagellate infusorians, represented by the genus Heteromita. They are naked, free or attached, with flagella distinct or united at the base, and the body ovate or elongate.

heteromorph (het'-e-rō-mōrf), n. One of the Heteromorphæ, as the hoactzin.

Heteromorpha (het'-e-rō-mōrf-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of heteromorphus; see heteromorphous.] A series of hexapod insects which undergo true and complete metamorphosis; the Metabola, including Coleoptera, Lepidoptera, Diptera, Neuroptera, and Hymenoptera: opposed to Homo-morpha.

Heteromorphæ (het'-e-rō-mōrf-ā), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of heteromorphus; see heteromorphous.] 1. A group of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.—2. In Huxley's classification of birds, a superfamily group established for the reception of the hoactzin, Opisthocomus cristatus: a synonym of Opisthocomi.

heteromorphic (het'-e-rō-mōrf-ik), a. [As heteromorphous + -ic.] 1. Deviating in form from a given type or standard; of irregular, abnormal, or unusual structure or composition.—2. In entom., undergoing entire transformation or complete metamorphosis; metabolous; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Heteromorpha or Heteromorphæ.

Also heteromorphous.

heteromorphism (het'-e-rō-mōrf-izm), n. [As heteromorphous + -ism.] The state or character of being heteromorphic; deviation from a type or norm, or from congruity. Specifically.—(a) In entom., existence under different forms at successive stages of development: the result of transformation or metaboly. Thus, an insect exhibits heteromorphism when it is a pupa or larva before it becomes an imago. (b) In bot., the property of having flowers differing from one another in the nature of their reproductive organs. See heterogonous. (c) In crystal., that property sometimes observed in compounds of crystallizing in different forms, though containing equal numbers of atoms similarly grouped, as in the case of the hydrous sulphates of zinc and ferrous iron, the former crystallizing in the orthorhombic, the latter in the monoclinic system.

heteromorphite (het'-e-rō-mōrf-īt), n. [As heteromorphous + -ite.] A variety of the mineral jamesonite.

heteromorphous (het'-e-rō-mōrf-fus), a. [NL. heteromorphus, Gr. ἑτερόμορφος, of another form, ἑτερος, other, different, + μορφή, form.] Same as heteromorphic.—Heteromorphous palpi, in entom., those palpi in which the two intermediate joints are much larger than the first or last.

heteromorphy (het'-e-rō-mōrf-i), n. [As heteromorphous + -y.] Heteromorphism; specifically, as used by teratologists, deformity in plants.

Heteromya (het'-e-rō-mi'-ā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μύς, a mussel, muscle, mouse, = E. mouse.] An order of bivalve or lamellibranch mollusks, in which the anterior or pallial adductor is much smaller than the posterior or pedal adductor, and in which siphons are seldom developed: distinguished from Iso-myia and Monomyia. The mussels are a familiar example.

Heteromyaria (het'-e-rō-mi'-ā'-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., as Heteromyia + -aria.] A group of accephalous conchiferous mollusks, including the Mytilidae, or mussels and related forms: distinguished from Dimyaria and Monomyaria.

heteromyarian (het'-e-rō-mi'-ā'-ri-an), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Heteromyaria.

Heteromyiinae (het'-e-rō-mi'-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερομυία, Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μύς = E. mouse.] The typical and only genus of Heteromyiinae, containing several species of pocket-mice of the warmer parts of America, resembling Perognathus, but with plain incisors and spinose pelage. H. anomalus of Trinidad, about the size of a common rat, is an example. Desmarest, 1804.

Heteromys (he-ter'-ō-mis), n. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + μύς = E. mouse.] The typical and only genus of Heteromysinae, containing several species of pocket-mice of the warmer parts of America, resembling Perognathus, but with plain incisors and spinose pelage. H. anomalus of Trinidad, about the size of a common rat, is an example. Desmarest, 1804.

Heteronemeat (het'-e-rō-nē'-mē-ē), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + νῆμα, a thread, + -eā.] A name applied by Fries to the higher cryptogams, such as the ferns, which were regarded as having a more complicated generation than the lower cryptogams.

heteronemous (het'-e-rō-nē'-mus), a. [As Heteronemeat + -ous.] Resembling or of the nature of the Heteronemeat.

heteronomic (het'-e-rō-nom'-ik), a. [As heteronomous + -ic.] Of unlike or opposite polarity: applied to contact of parts of the human body in experiments in animal magnetism: opposed to isonomic.

Heteronomic [contact] is hypersthesic and increases it [muscular energy]. Amer. Jour. of Psychol., 1. 502.

heteronomous (het-e-rōn'ō-mus), a. [Gr. ἑτερονόμος, other, different, + νόμος, law.] 1. In biol., of a different kind or order in any series or set of related things; differentiated or specialized in some way from a common type, in accordance with a law of adaptive modification. Thus, the cephalothorax of a crustacean is heteronomous with the abdominal segments, though both are composed of primitively similar metameres. 2. Pertaining to or characterized by heteronomy.

heteronomy (het-e-rōn'ō-mi), n. [As heteronom-ous + -y.] 1. Subordination or subjection to a law imposed by another or from without: opposed to autonomy.

to substitute the moral autonomy of the conscience, which is a modern idea, for the heteronomy of the Divine will and revelation—[is] a clear forsaking of Christian ground. Westminster Rev., CXXVI. 457.

2. Specifically, in the Kantian ethics, subjection of the will to the control of the natural appetites, passions, and desires, instead of to the moral law of reason.

heteronym (het-e-rō-nim), n. [= F. hétéronyme, Gr. ἑτερόνυμος, having a different name, < ἕτερος, other, different, + ὄνομα, ὄνομα, name.]

1. A word having a different sound and meaning from another, but the same spelling, as lead, conduct, and *lead*², a metal: distinguished from homonym in a narrow sense—that is, a word having the same sound as another, but not the same spelling.—2. A different name of the same thing; a name in one language precisely translating a name in another language; a linguistic synonym, having literally the same meaning as some other word of another language. [Rare.]

Vernacular names which are more or less precise translations of Latin names, or of names in any other language, may be called heteronyms.

B. G. Wilder, Jour. Nerv. Diseases, xii. (1885).

heteronymic (het-e-rō-nim'ik), a. [Gr. ἑτερόνυμος + -ic.] Same as heteronymous.

heteronymous (het-e-rō-ni'mus), a. [Gr. ἑτερόνυμος, having a different name: see heteronym.] 1. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or having a heteronym.—2. Of a different name: specifically, in optics, said of the double images of an object as seen under certain conditions. See homonymy.

Synonymous relatives are of the same name, heteronymous of a different name. Watts, Philosophy, p. 353.

The eye (or the mind) instinctively distinguishes homonymy from heteronymous images, referring the former to objects beyond, and the latter to objects this side of, the point of sight. Le Conte, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 539.

Heteronymous principles, principles drawn from different sciences.—Heteronymous relates, things whose relation to one another is not reciprocal, as father and son: opposed to synonymous relates, as cousins.

heteronymously (het-e-rō-ni'mus-li), adv. In a heteronymous manner; so as to be heteronymous.

Place one forefinger before the other in the median plane; i. e., when we look at the farther finger, the nearer one is doubled heteronymously. Le Conte, Sight, p. 120.

heteronymy (het-e-rō-ni'mi), n. [Gr. ἑτερονυμία, a different name, the having a different name, < ἑτερόνυμος, having a different name: see heteronym.] 1. The relation between two or more heteronyms.—2. The system according to which heteronyms are employed. See paronymy.

heteroousia, Heteroousian, etc. See heterousia, etc.

heteropathic (het-e-rō-path'ik), a. [Gr. ἑτεροπάθεια + -ic.] Same as allopathic. [Rare.]

heteropathy (het-e-rōp'a-thi), n. [Formed after Gr. ἑτεροπάθεια, counter-irritation, but taken in a deflected sense, as in allopathy, < ἕτερος, other, different, + πάθος, suffering.] Same as allopathy. [Rare.]

Heteropelma (het-e-rō-pel'mā), n. [NL, fem. of heteropelmus: see heteropelmus.] 1. In entom., a genus of ichneumon-flies, of the subfamily Ophioninae, having the first joint of the hind tarsi four times as long as the second. There are one European and two American species. H. flavicornis of the United States is a common parasite of the larvae of Datana.

2. A neotropical genus of birds, of the family Cotingidae and subfamily Lipauginae. H. turdinus of Brazil is an example. Schiff (in Bona parte, 1853).

heteropelmous (het-e-rō-pel'mus), a. [NL, heteropelmus, < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + πέλος, the sole of the foot.] In ornith., peculiar in the disposition of the flexor tendons in the sole of the foot; having that arrangement of these which is peculiar to the trogons or Heterodactyl, in which each of the flexors splits into two tendons, and the flexor hallucis supplies the two posterior toes (first and second digits), while the flexor peroneus supplies the two anterior toes.

This structure, found nowhere else, we shall designate as heteropelmous. Stand. Nat. Hist., IV. 369.

Heterophagi (het-e-rōf'ā-gi), n. pl. [NL, pl. of heterophagus: see heterophagus.] In ornith., the class of birds the young of which require to be fed by their parents; the altricial birds: opposed to Autophagi. See Altricial.

heterophagus (het-e-rōf'ā-gus), a. [NL, heterophagus, < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + φαγεῖν, eat.] Needing to be fed by others, as the young of the Heterophagi; altricial.

heterophasia (het-e-rō-fā'si-ā), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + φάσις, a saying, < φάω, say.] In pathol., a form of aphasia in which the patient constantly misapplies the terms he uses.

heterophasiac (het-e-rō-fā'si-ak), n. [Gr. heterophasia + -ac.] One who is affected with heterophasia.

heterophemism (het-e-rō-fē'mizm), n. [Gr. heterophem-y + -ism.] 1. Same as heterophemy.—2. An instance of heterophemy.

I have several examples in which creditor is used for debtor—perhaps the most common of all heterophemisms—in one of which a man is actually spoken of as "an absconding creditor." R. G. White, The Galaxy, XX. 693.

heterophemist (het-e-rō-fē'mist), n. [Gr. heterophem-y + -ist.] One afflicted with heterophemy.

heterophemistic (het-e-rō-fē'mis'tik), a. [Gr. heterophem-y + -ist-ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by heterophemy.

heterophemize (het-e-rō-fē'miz), v. i.; pret. and pp. heterophemized, pp. heterophemizing. [Gr. heterophem-y + -ize.] To say one thing when another is meant.

As Saul appeared among the prophets, so Henry Ward Beecher appears among the heterophemists; and characteristically of all that he does, he heterophemizes in a very striking manner. R. G. White, The Galaxy, XX. 697.

heterophemy (het-e-rō-fē'mi), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + φήμη, a speech, saying (= L. fama, > E. fame, q. v.), < φάω, speak, say.] The saying of one thing when another is meant; specifically, a disordered or morbid mental condition which leads to the saying or writing of one thing when another is meant; physical incapacity to express one's ideas in language conveying a correct impression. When heterophemy becomes a pronounced disease it is known as aphasia. Also heterophemism.

Another incident of its manifestation is that the assertion made is most often not merely something that the speaker or writer does not mean to say, but its very reverse, or at least something notably at variance with his purpose. For this reason I have called it heterophemy, which means merely the speaking otherwise, and which has relations to and illustrations in heterodoxy, heterogeneity, and heteroclit.

R. G. White, The Galaxy, XX. 693.

heterophonia (het-e-rō-fō'ni-ā), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + φωνή, sound, voice.] Change of voice; cracked or broken voice. Dunlapson.

heterophoria (het-e-rō-fō'ri-ā), n. [NL, < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + φορία, < φέρω = E. bear.] 1. A tendency of the visual axes to fail to meet in the fixation-point, due to weakness of one or more of the ocular muscles or their faulty innervation; insufficiency of the eye-muscles; muscular asthenopia.

heterophyadic (het-e-rō-fī-ad'ik), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + (ΜΓΡ.) φάειν (φάειν), a shoot, sucker, < φύω, grow.] In bot., characterized, as species of the genus Equisetum, by the production of two kinds of stems, one (usually appearing early in the spring) bearing the fructification, which soon withers entirely or at the apex, and the other bearing the sterile or vegetative branches. See homophyadic.

heterophyl, heterophyll (het-e-rō-fil), n. [NL, heterophyllus: see heterophyllous.] A species of ammonite having two forms of foliation or volution of the septal margins; one of the Heterophylli.

Heterophylli (het-e-rō-fil'i), n. pl. [NL, pl. of heterophyllus: see heterophyllous.] A group of cephalopods containing those ammonites which have different kinds of foliation or volution of the septal margins.

heterophyllous (het-e-rō-fil'us), a. [NL, heterophyllus, < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + φύλλον, leaf.] 1. In bot., having two different kinds of leaves on the same stem, as Potamo- geton heterophyllus, which has broad floating leaves, with narrow leaves submerged in the water.—2. In zool., pertaining to or having the characters of the Heterophylli, as an ammonite. heterophyllly (het-e-rō-fil'i), n. [As heterophyllous + -y.] In bot., the condition of having leaves different from the regular form.

Variability of species and heterophyllly are characteristic of the flora to quite an unusual degree. Encyc. Brit., XX. 619.

heteroplasia (het-e-rō-plā'si-ā), n. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + πλάσις, a forming, molding, < πλάσσειν, form.] In pathol., the development of a form of tissue in a location where it does not normally occur; abnormality of tissue, as in tuberculosis.

heteroplastic (het-e-rō-plas'tik), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + πλάστικός, plastic, < πλάσσειν, form.] 1. Pertaining to or characterized by heteroplasia.

The myxomata often have a heteroplastic origin.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 100.

2. Dissimilar in structure, as different tissues of the body. Thus, nerve-tissue, muscle-tissue, and bone-tissue are heteroplastic with reference one to another.

heteropod (het-e-rō-pod), a. and n. [NL, heteropod (-pod-), < Gr. ἑτερόπους, with uneven feet, < ἕτερος, other, different, + πούς (pod-) = E. foot.] 1. A pertaining to or having the characters of the Heteropoda. Also heteropodous.

II. n. One of the Heteropoda. Also heteropodan.

Heteropoda (het-e-rōp'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL, neut. pl. of heteropod (-pod-): see heteropod.] In zool., a name applied to several groups. (a) In Crustacea, a group of amphipods or isopods including forms with 14 feet, some of which are fitted for swimming. Latreille, 1829. (b) A class of Mollusca, or an order or a subclass of Gastropoda; the nucleobranchiate mollusks, having the foot (propodium) modified into a swimming-organ or vertical fin lacking epipodia, the gills when present massed on the hinder part of the back, and the shell small or wanting. They are free-swimming pelagic organisms, of delicate, gelatinous, hyaline or transparent structure. There are two families, Friolidae and Atlantidae. The leading genera of the former are Friola (or Pterotrachea) and Carinariia, and of the latter Atlantia and the fossil Bellerophon. Caryophoranchia is a synonym. (c) A group of schinoderms. Also written Heteropodes. Brandt, 1835.

heteropodan (het-e-rōp'ō-dan), n. Same as heteropod.

heteropodous (het-e-rōp'ō-dus), a. Same as heteropod.

heteropolar (het-e-rō-pō-lār), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + πόλος, pole: see polar.] 1. Having polar correspondence to something other than itself.—2. In morphology, having unequal or dissimilar poles: said of the figures called stauraxonia heteropola. See stauraxonia.

heteroproral (het-e-rō-prō'rāl), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + NL, prora, q. v.] Having unequal or dissimilar prora, as a pterocymba; not homoproral.

The prora may be similar (homoproral) or dissimilar (heteroproral). Encyc. Brit., XXII. 418.

heteropsychological (het-e-rō-si'kō-lōj'ik-al), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + E. psychological.] See extract under idiopsychological.

heteropter (het-e-rōp'ter), n. A heteropterous insect; one of the Heteroptera.

Heteroptera (het-e-rōp'te-rā), n. pl. [NL, neut. pl. of heteropter: see heteropterous.] One of the two prime divisions of hemipterous insects founded by Latreille (1817). It is a sub-order of Hemiptera, contrasted with Homoptera, from which it differs in the horizontal posture of the head, which is socketed in a hollow of the prothorax, and has a usually 4-jointed rostrum at the tip, and in the structure and position of the wings, which lie flat on the back, and are composed of three recognizable parts, the corium, the clavus, and the membrane (the last being veined and overlapping its fellow), with sometimes a fourth piece, the cuneus, at the end of the corium. The Heteroptera are those insects to which the popular term bug is specially applicable.

heteropteran (het-e-rōp'te-ran), n. One of the Heteroptera; a heteropter or true bug.

heteropterous (het-e-rōp'te-rus), a. [NL, heteropter, < Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + πτερόν, wing.] Having diversiform wings; having the wings composed of several distinct parts; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Heteroptera.

heteroptics (het-e-rōp'tiks), n. [Gr. ἕτερος, other, different, + ὀπτικός, optic: see optic, optics.] False vision; perverted use of the eyes.

This irregularity in vision, together with such enormities as tipping the wink, the circumspective roll, the side peep through a thin hood or fan, must be put in the class of Heteroptics, as all wrong notions of religion are ranked under the general name of Heterodox. Spectator, No. 250.

heterototon (het'-ə-rōp-tō'ton), n.; pl. heterotota (-tā). [< Gr. ἑτεροτότος, differently declined, < ἕτερος, other, different, + ὅτις, inflection, case, < πῶτος, verbal adj. of πίπτειν, fall.] In gram. and rhet., enallage of case; antipthesis.

heteropygian (het'-ə-rō-pij'-i-an), n. A fish of the group Heteropygii; an amblyopsid.

Heteropygii (het'-ə-rō-pij'-i-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + πύγι, rump.] A family of abdominal fishes, having the anus jugular, or under the throat: same as Amblyopsidae. Müller. In Günther's system of classification they are characterized by having the head naked, the body covered with very small scales, the margin of the upper jaw formed by the intermaxillaries, villiform teeth both in the jaws and on the palate, a dorsal fin belonging to the caudal portion of the spinal column and opposite the anal, ventral fins rudimentary or absent, and the vent situated before the pectorals. The group includes the blind-fish of the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky and several related species. See cut under Amblyopsidae.

Heterorhina (het'-ə-rō-rī'nā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ῥίς (ῥα-), nose.] 1. A genus of cetonian scarabæoid beetles, having an extremely variable structure and armature of the clypeus (whence the name), comprising many Asiatic and African forms. Also written Heterorrhina. Westwood, 1842.—2. A genus of American wrens, of the family Troglodytidae, having the bill notched at the end, oval nostrils with incomplete septum, and tail two thirds as long as the wings. There are several species, of Mexico and the regions southward. S. F. Baird, 1864.

heterorhizal (het'-ə-rō-rī'zāl), a. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + ῥίζα, root.] In bot., rooting from no fixed point, as do most cryptogams. [Rare.]

heteroscan (het'-ə-rōsh'-i-an), n. and a. [< Gr. ἑτεροσκῶν, throwing a shadow in opposite directions (at noon), < ἕτερος, other, different, + σκῶ, a shadow: see antiscian, squirrel.] 1. n. A person living on one side of the equator, as contrasted with one living on the other side: so called from the fact that, except in the tropics, their shadows at noon always fall in opposite directions, the shadow in the northern zones toward the north, and that in the southern toward the south.

II. a. Of or pertaining to portions of the earth's surface on opposite sides of the equator, in which shadows fall in opposite directions, or to one such portion as contrasted with another.

heterosis (het'-ə-rō'sis), n. [< Gr. ἑτερόσις, var. of ἑτεροσίσις, < ἑτεροῖσιν, alter, make different, < ἕτερος, other, different.] In gram. and rhet., same as enallage.

Heterosomata (het'-ə-rō-sō'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + σῶμα, pl. σώματα, body.] A suborder of teleostcephalous anacanthine fishes; the flatfishes: so called from their lack of bilateral symmetry. The group is represented by the families Pleuronectidae, which contain such important food-fishes as the halibut, turbot, plaice, flounder, etc., and Soleidae or soles. In Bonaparte's and Cope's systems of classification, the Heterosomata are ranked as an order of physoclistous fishes, with the ventral fins thoracic or jugular, and with the posterior cephalic region normal, but the anterior so twisted as to bring both orbits on one side of the head.

heterosomatous (het'-ə-rō-sōm'-ā-tus), a. [As Heterosomata + -ous.] In ichth., having a body differing from the usual type, especially one that is bilaterally asymmetrical; specifically, of or pertaining to the Heterosomata. Also heterosomous.

heterosome (het'-ə-rō-sōm), n. One of the Heterosomata; a flatfish.

heterosomous (het'-ə-rō-sō'mus), a. Same as heterosomatous.

Heterosporæ (het'-ə-rō-spō'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + σπόρος, seed, + -æ.] A subdivision of the ferns, Equisetaceæ and Lycopodiaceæ, characterized by the production of two kinds of spores, macrospores and microspores.

heterosporous (het'-ə-rōs'-pō-rus), a. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + σπόρος, seed.] Having more than one kind of asexually produced spores: applied to the vascular cryptogams, which have macrospores or megaspores (female spores) homologous with the embryo-sac of phanerogams, and microspores (male spores) homologous with the pollen-grains of phanerogams.

heterostatic (het'-ə-rō-stat'ik), a. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + (in def. 1) στατικός, causing to stand (στάσις, a standing, position), or (in def. 2) fem. στατική, the art of weighing, < ἵσταναι, cause to stand, etc., weigh: see static.] 1. Pertaining to three axes which can be drawn at every point of every elastic body such that, denoting them by the letters x, y, z, if a very small cube be cut out of the body with its edges parallel to those axes, and if the cube be twisted by a given amount round x, then a normal stress will be produced upon the faces to which x is normal equal to the tangential stress which would be produced round z by an equal amount of twisting round y.—2. Applied to instruments for measuring potential by electrostatic methods in which electrification other than that to be tested is made use of.

Instruments in which the only electrification is that which we wish to test are called idiostatic. Those in which there is electrification independent of that to be tested are called heterostatic. Clerk Maxwell.

heterostaural (het'-ə-rō-stā'ral), a. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + σταυρός, a stake, cross.] In morphol., having an irregular polygon as the base of a pyramidal figure: applied to the figures called staurazonia heteropola, and opposed to homostaural. See staurazonia.

Heterostoma (het'-ə-rōs'-tō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερόστομα, one-edged, half and half, lit. with different mouths, < ἕτερος, different, + στόμα, mouth.] A genus of chilopod myriapods, of the family Scolopendridæ.

heterostrophe (het'-ə-rōs'-trō-fē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + στροφή, a turning.] Same as heterostrophy.

heterostrophic (het'-ə-rō-strof'ik), a. [In def. 1, < heterostrophy + -ic. In def. 2, < Gr. ἑτερόστροφος, consisting of different strophes, lit. having different turns, < ἕτερος, other, different, + στροφή, a turning, strophe.] 1. Pertaining to or resulting from heterostrophy; reversed in direction; turned the other way; in conch., having the spire whorled in the direction opposite to the usual one, as in Physa heterostropha, for example: said of a univalve shell.—2. In anc. pros., consisting of two systems of different metrical form: as, a heterostrophic song or choric passage.

heterostrophous (het'-ə-rōs'-trō-fus), a. [< heterostrophe + -ous.] Same as heterostrophic.

heterostrophy (het'-ə-rōs'-trō-fī), n. [As heterostrophe.] A contrary or opposite turning; the condition of being reversed in direction; specifically, in conch., reversal of the direction in which spiral shells usually turn. Also heterostrophe.

heterostyled (het'-ə-rō-stīld), a. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + στυλος, a pillar, style: see style.] Heterogonous: opposed to homostyled.

The essential character of plants belonging to the heterostyled class is that the individuals are divided into two or three bodies like the males and females of dioecious plants or of the higher animals, which exist in approximately equal numbers, and are adapted for reciprocal fertilization. Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 244.

heterostylism (het'-ə-rō-stī'lizm), n. [As heterostyl(ed) + -ism.] The state of being heterogonous.

There is no evidence that two sets of individuals exist which differ slightly in function and are adapted for reciprocal fertilization; and this is the essence of heterostylism. Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 50.

heterotactous (het'-ə-rō-tak'tus), a. [As heterotaxis (-tact-) + -ous.] Pertaining to or characterized by heterotaxis. Specifically—(a) In geol., irregular or not uniform in arrangement or stratification; heterogeneous. (b) In bot., having organs deviating in position or arrangement from a normal type.

heterotactic (het'-ə-rō-tak'tik), a. [< heterotaxis + -ic; prop. heterotactic*: see tactic.] Characterized by or exhibiting heterotaxis; not homotactic.

heterotaxis (het'-ə-rō-tak'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + τάξις, arrangement (τακτός, ordered, arranged), < τάσσειν, order, arrange.] Anomalous arrangement; aberrant or abnormal disposition of parts or organs: the opposite of homotaxis.

heterotaxy (het'-ə-rō-tak'tsi), n. [As heterotaxis.] Same as heterotaxis.

Heterothalamæ (het'-ə-rō-thalā'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (De Candolle, 1836), < Heterothalamus + -æ.] A subdivision of plants of the natural order Compositæ, tribe Asteroideæ, typified by the genus Heterothalamus.

Heterothalamus (het'-ə-rō-thal'-ā-mus), n. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + θάλαμος, taken in mod. bot. sense, thalamus.] A small genus of asteroid composite plants, the type of De Candolle's tribe Heterothalamæ, and closely allied to the genus Becharia. It is characterized by having polygamo-dioecious heads. The hermaphrodite plants bear either sterile flowers in the disk, or a single row of fertile female flowers around the edge; the female plants bear fertile flowers, of which the achenia are compressed or 3-angled; the hermaphrodite achenia are abortive; the pappus is in one series or more, and copious; the leaves are alternate, and entire or dentate; and the flowers are corymbose or paniculate, and yellow. Only five species are known, all natives of South America. H. brunioides, of southern Brazil, furnishes the yellow romerillo dye from its flowers.

Heterotheca (het'-ə-rō-thē'kā), n. [NL. (so called from the unlike achenia of the ray and disk), < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + θεῖν, a case.] A small genus of North American and Mexican herbs, belonging to the natural order Compositæ, tribe Asteroideæ, the type of De Candolle's tribe Heterothecæ. It is characterized by having the ray- and disk-flowers numerous, and both fertile; the style-branches of the hermaphrodite flowers tipped with a lanceolate or ovate triangular appendage; the achenia of the ray thickish, often triangular, without pappus, or rarely with a bristle or two; the disk compressed, and with a double pappus, the inner composed of long capillary bristles, the outer of numerous short squamæ; the leaves alternate; the flowers yellow; and the pappus brownish. Aublet, 1775.

Heterothecæ (het'-ə-rō-thē'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (De Candolle, 1836), < Heterotheca + -æ.] A subdivision of plants belonging to the natural order Compositæ, tribe Asteroideæ, typified by the genus Heterotheca.

heterotomous (het'-ə-rōt'-ō-mus), a. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, cut.] In mineral., having a cleavage different from the common variety: applied to a variety of feldspar.

heterotopia (het'-ə-rō-tō'pi-ā), n. Same as heterotopy.

heterotopic (het'-ə-rō-top'ik), a. [< heterotopy + -ic.] Same as heterotopous.

heterotopism (het'-ə-rōt'-ō-pizm), n. [As heterotopy + -ism.] Same as heterotopy.

heterotopous (het'-ə-rōt'-ō-pus), a. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + τόπος, place.] Misplaced; pertaining to or characterized by heterotopy: applied specifically in pathology to tissue occurring in an abnormal situation. Also heterotopia.

heterotopy (het'-ə-rōt'-ō-pi), n. [< NL. heterotopia: see heterotopous.] Disarrangement in position; misplacement. Specifically—(a) In pathol., the occurrence of a tissue forming a neoplasm in an abnormal position. (b) In biol., a disarrangement of an order of development affecting the place of the resulting phenomena. See heterochrony. Also heterotopism, heterotopia.

Virchow opposed both the view that the jaw (the infant giant jaw-bone of Stromberg) was like that of an ape and the one that it was a child's. The case was a rare instance of heterotopy in a man of gigantic size.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII, 138.

Displacement in position, or heterotopy, especially affects the cells or elementary parts which compose the organs; but it also affects the organs themselves.

Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I, 13.

Heterotricha (het'-ə-rōt'-ri-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of heterotrichus: see heterotrichous.]

An order of ciliate infusorians. These animalcules are either free-swimming or attached, naked or loricate, and are entirely ciliated. The cilia form two widely distinct systems, those of the general cuticular surface being short and fine, and those of the oral region of much larger size, cirrose, and constituting a linear or more or less spiral or circular series. The cortical layers are usually highly differentiated, and inclose an even, parallel series of longitudinally disposed muscular fibrille. The order contains by far the largest of the infusorians, many of its members being visible to the naked eye, and some ranging in size up to one sixth of an inch. There are 20 or more genera, ranged by Kent in 7 families, Bursariidae, Spirostomidae, Stentoridae, Tintinnidae, Trichodendropidae, Codoniellidae, and Calceolidae. Heterotricha is one of the four orders established by Stein, the others being Holotricha, Lipotricha, and Peritricha.

heterotrichal (het'-ə-rōt'-ri-kāl), a. Same as heterotrichous. Encyc. Brit.

heterotrichous (het'-ə-rōt'-ri-kus), a. [< NL. heterotrichus, < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + θρίξ (τριχ-), hair.] Having unlike cilia scattered over the body; specifically, of or pertaining to the Heterotricha.

Heterotrichum (het'-ə-rōt'-ri-kum), n. [NL. (De Candolle, 1828), < Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + θρίξ (τριχ-), hair.] A genus of shrubs belonging to the natural order Melastomaceæ, tribe Miconiæ. It is characterized by having the calyx campanulate, and 6- to 8-lobed; the corolla of 6 to 8 white or rose-colored obovate petals; numerous stamens, the anthers of which at first open by a single terminal pore, later by a fissure; and the fruit forming a tough berry. The leaves are large, ovate-cordate or oblong, and entire or serrulate. Six species are known, from Guiana and the West Indies. H. niveum is called the American gooseberry in the West Indies.

heterotropical (het'-ə-rōt'-rō-pāl), a. Same as heterotropous.

heterotrophy (het'-ə-rōt'-rō-fī), n. [< Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + τροφή, nourishment, < τρέφειν, feed.] In bot., an abnormal mode of obtaining nutrition, observed especially in the Cupuliferæ. These plants, according to Frank, are destitute of root-hairs, and depend for their nutrition upon a fungus, the mycelium of which closely surrounds the roots and acts in the capacity of root-hairs. In contradistinction to these are most ordinary plants, which obtain their nourishment by autotrophy—that is, by means of ordinary root-hairs. See symbiosis.

heterotropic (het'e-rōt-rōp'ik), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + τροπή, a turning, < τρέπω, turn.] Anisotropic; atropic: opposed to isotropic.

heterotropous (het'e-rōt-rō-pus), a. [Gr. ἑτερος, other, different, + τρέπω, turn.] In bot., having the embryo or ovule oblique or transverse to the axis of the seed. Also heterotropical.

heterousia, heteroousia (het'e-rō'si-ä, -rō-ö'si-ä), n. [LGr. ἑτεροουσία, ἑτεροουσία, difference of essence or nature, < ἑτεροουσιος, also ἑτεροουσιος, of different essence or nature: see heterousious.] Different essence; essential difference of nature or constitution. See Heterousian.

Semi-Arianism occupied an untenable middle ground between the Arian heteroousia, or difference of essence, and the orthodox homo-ousia, or equality of essence, Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 58.

Heterousian, Heteroousian (het'e-rō'si-an, -rō-ö'si-an), n. and a. [Gr. ἑτεροουσιαν, ἑτεροουσιαν, + -αν.] I. n. Eccles., one who believes the Father and the Son to be unlike in substance or essence; an Arian: opposed to Homoousian. Also Heterousiast, Heteroousiast.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Heterousians or the doctrine of an essential difference between the Father and the Son: as, the Heterousian heresy. See Homoousian.

Heterousiast, Heteroousiast (het'e-rō'si-ast, -rō-ö'si-ast), n. [As Heterousi-an, Heteroousi-an, + -ast.] Same as Heterousian.

heterousious, heteroousious (het'e-rō'si-us, -rō-ö'si-us), a. [LGr. ἑτεροουσιος, less correctly ἑτεροουσιος, of different essence or nature, < ἑτερος, other, different, + οὐσία, essence, < ὦν, fem. οὐσα (ὄν-), ppr. of εἶναι, be: see am (under be) and ens, ontology, etc.] Eccles., essentially different; of unlike essence or substance: an epithet much used (in the Greek form) in the ancient Arian controversy, the Arians maintaining that the Son was created, and therefore was not the same in substance or essence (heteroousious) with the Father.

heterozetesis (het'e-rō-zē-tē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑτεροζέτης, other, different, + ζήτησις, inquiry, < ζητεῖν, inquire, ask.] In logic, the fallacy of ignoring the elench, which consists in replying to an argument different from that which the opponent has advanced, or in disproving something which the opponent has not maintained.

hethen¹, n. and a. A Middle English form of heathen.

hethen², adv. [ME., also hithen, hythen, < Ice. hedhan = Sw. håden = Dan. heden, hence, with a separative suffix -than, from the pron. stem represented by *he*¹. Cf. equiv. hen², hence, from the same ult. source.] Hence; from this place; from this time.

Alle come we hyder nakude and bare,
Whenne we hethene passe, is there no mare.
Book of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 85.

That is hythyn thre daies iornay,
The ganeste gate that i gane gois.
York Plays, p. 59.

hethenesset, n. A Middle English form of heatheness.

hethingt, n. [ME., < Ice. hæthing, a scoffing, hædhung, scorn, shame, disgrace, < hædh, scoffing, mocking.] Contempt; mockery.

He hade not of hom but hæthyng & skorne,
Grete wordis & gref, & moche grym threte;
That doubtis my dole, & to dethe byrgis.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 2594.

Now are we dryve til hæthyng and til scorn.
Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 190.

hetman (het'man), n. [= Gr. hetman, < Pol. hetman, ataman = Little Russ. hetman, ataman, otaman, otaman = Russ. ataman, < G. hauptmann, chieftain, captain = E. head-man, q. v.] 1. In Poland, the commander of an army. The great hetman was formerly the commander-in-chief in the old kingdom of Poland.—2. Among the Cossacks, formerly, the elected chief of each of their principal communities; a Cossack chief; an ataman. The hetmans received extensive privileges from their Polish suzerains in the sixteenth century, which were continued after the Cossacks passed under the Russian rule in 1654. Their rights were greatly restricted by Peter the Great, and the office of hetman of the Ukraine Cossacks was abolished by Catherine II. A hetman of the Don Cossacks continues to exist, but his duties are those of a governor-general. Since 1835 the heir apparent of the Russian throne is hereditary hetman of all the Cossacks, and is represented by a "hetman by delegation" for each of their territorial divisions. Hetman (ataman) is also the common title of subordinate Cossack chiefs.

In the middle of the seventeenth century, an attempt of the King of Poland to enforce Popery upon the Cossacks, and to make their prince a hetman, delegate of his power, roused the indignation of the people.

A. J. C. Hare, Studies in Russia, ix.
hetmanate (het'man-ät), n. [Gr. hetman + -ate³.] The rule or administration of a hetman.

During the hetmanate it had fortifications of which traces are still extant. Encyc. Brit., X. 6.

hetmanship (het'man-ship), n. [Gr. hetman + -ship.] The office of a hetman.

Hetmanship . . . was abolished by Catherine II.
A. J. C. Hare, Studies in Russia, ix.

hettet, An obsolete preterit of heat.

hettet, a. compar. An obsolete form of hotter. Chaucer.

hettle, a. and n. See hattle.

Heuchera (hū'kēr-ä), n. [NL., named after Prof. Heuchera, a German botanist.] A genus of polypetalous dicotyledonous plants, belonging to the natural order Saxifragaceæ, tribe Saxifragaceæ, and the type of Bartling's tribe Heuchereæ. The calyx is bell-shaped, the tube cohering at the base with the ovary, 5-cleft; the petals are 5 in number, spatulate, small, and entire; the stamens 5 in number; the styles 2, and slender; and the pod 1-celled, with 2 parietal many-seeded placentae, and 2-beaked, opening a, flower; b, c, fruit, entire and cut transversely.

Alum-root (Heuchera Americana).

between the beaks. They are perennials, with round heart-shaped leaves, principally from the rootstock. The flowers are in small clusters disposed in a prolonged and narrow panicle, and are greenish or purplish. About 20 species are known, natives of North America and Mexico. The root furnishes a powerful astringent, whence the name alum-root applied to some of the species, particularly H. Americana. H. villosa is sometimes called the American sarsile.

Heuchereæ (hū-kēr-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Heuchera + -eæ.] A tribe of plants belonging to the natural order Saxifragaceæ, proposed by Bartling (1830), typified by the genus Heuchera.

heught (hūch), n. [Sc., also written heuch, formerly huwe, heuw, etc., = E. how², a hill: see how².] 1. A crag; a precipice; a rugged steep; a glen with steep overhanging sides.

A laidley worm in Spindlestone-Heughs
Would ruin the North Country.
The Laidley Worm of Spindlestone-Heugh (Child's Ballads, [I. 288]).

2. A coal-mine; a pit.

heuk¹ (hūk), n. A Scotch form of hook. Burns.

heuk² (hūk), n. See huke.

heulandite (hū'lan-dit), n. [After H. Heuland, an English dealer in minerals.] A mineral belonging to the zeolite group. It occurs in white to red or gray monoclinic crystals, with pearly luster on the surface of perfect cleavage. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminium and calcium.

heuretic (hū-rē'tik), n. [Gr. εὐρητικός, inventive (cf. εὐρητής, an inventor, discoverer), < εὐρίσκω (eûpe-), invent, find out. Cf. eureka.] The art of discovery or invention: a branch of logic.

heuristic (hū-ris'tik), a. [Gr. εὐρίσκω (eûpe-), find out (see heuretic), + -ist-ic.] Serving to find or discover.

We can, indeed, use the idea that the world is an organic whole, determined in relation to an end which consciousness sets for itself, as an heuristic principle to guide us in following the connexion of things with each other.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 84.

heurteloup (hēr'tè-lōp), n. [After Baron Heurteloup.] An artificial leech; an instrument for cutting and cupping a small area.

Local bleeding is better done with the heurteloup than with leeches. Medical News, LIII. 73.

heurts, n. pl. See hur².

hevet, v. A Middle English form of heave.

Hevea (hē'vē-ä), n. [NL.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, of the natural order Euphorbiaceæ, tribe Crotoneæ, the type of Baillon's tribe Heveæ. It is characterized by having 3-foliate leaves; a lax panicle of flowers, of which the calyx is 5-toothed or with 5 short lobes, and no corolla; stamens 5 to 10, with the filaments united in a column; and 3-valved capsular fruit. About 10 species are known, natives of tropical Brazil and Guiana. This genus furnishes the most valuable caoutchouc or india-rubber exported from South America. The best is obtained from H. brasiliensis. The seeds of these trees are poisonous to man and quadrupeds, but are harmless to and greedily eaten by birds. Prolonged boiling deprives them of their poison and renders them palatable.

Heveæ (hē'vē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hevea + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Euphorbiaceæ, proposed by Baillon in 1874, the genus Hevea being the type.

hevedi, n. A Middle English form of head. Chaucer.

hevent, n. A Middle English form of heaven.

hew¹ (hū), v.; pret. hewed, pp. hewed or heven, ppr. hewing. [ME. hewen (pret. hew, heow, pp. hewen), < AS. hedwan (pret. hedu, pp. hedwen) = OS. hāwan = OFries. hāwa, howa = D. houwen = MLG. houwen, hoben, hogen = OHG. houwan, MHG. houwen, G. hauen = Ice. höggva = Sw. hugga = Dan. hugge, cut, hew, = Goth. haggwan* (?), not recorded, = OBulg. Serv. kovati, Russ. kovati, etc., strike, hammer, forge (a word widely developed in Slav.) = Lith. kauti, strike, forge, = Lett. kaut, strike. From the same root are hay¹ and, through F., hoel; also prob. hack¹, with hatch³, hatchet, hash¹, etc.] I. trans. 1. To cut; especially, to cut with an ax, a hatchet, or a sword with a swinging blow; cut with a heavy blow or with repeated blows: as, to hew down a tree.

Er thei were alle yune thei were many slayn and for heven.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 234.

Wel coude he heven wood, and water here,
For he was yong and mighty.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 564.

Hew them in pieces; hack their bones sunder.
Shak., i Hen. VI., iv. 7.

2. To form or shape by blows with a sharp instrument; cut roughly into form; shape out by cutting: often with out: as, to hew timber; to hew out a sepulcher from a rock.

A ful hugge hegt hit haled vpon lofte,
Of harde heven ston vp to the tablez.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 789.

Lammikin was as gude a mason
As ever hewed a stane.

Lammikin (Child's Ballads, III. 307).

I now pass my days, not studios nor idle, rather polishing old works than heving out new ones. Pope, To Swift.

II. intrans. To cut; inflict cutting blows.

Deth with his axe so faste on me doth heve.
Court of Love, l. 980.

Full ofte he hevet up so highe
That chippes fallen in his eye.

Gower, Conf. Amant, l. 108.

hew¹ (hū), n. [hew¹, v.] Destruction by cutting down.

Of whom he makes such havocke and such hew
That swarmes of damned souls to hell he sends.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. viii. 49.

hew², n. An obsolete spelling of hue¹.

hew³, n. An obsolete spelling of hue².

hewet, n. [ME., < AS. hēwa, in pl. hēwan, household, servants, = OS. hēwa, f., wife, = OHG. hīwo, m., husband, hīwā, f., wife: see hind².] A servant or retainer.

O servaunt traitour, false homly hewe.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 541.

hewedit, a. See hued.

hewer (hū'ēr), n. One who hews.

And the princeas said unto them, Let them live; but let them be hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation. Josh. ix. 21.

Specifically—(a) In coal-mining, the miner who cuts the coal. (b) In timbering, one who uses a heavy broadax in squaring timber.

hewgag (hū'gag), n. [Appar. a made word, prob. based on gewgaw, a jew's-harp.] 1. A toy musical instrument consisting of a hollow wooden pipe, about 4 inches long and half an inch in diameter, with a hole near one end and closed with parchment at the other, producing, when blown, a loud doleful sound. It was in use about 1856. Hence—2. An imaginary musical instrument feigned to be loudly sounded on occasions of special jubilation. [Humorous, U. S.]

To-day Hanscomb sends a letter "all about it" [Davies's first speech in Congress], setting it out with the accompanying "sound of hewgag."

S. Bowles, in Merriam's Bowles, I. 295.

hewhole (hū'hōl), n. [E. dial., regarded as hewl, v., + obj. hole], in ref. to its wood-pecking habit; also highhole and highholder (in U. S.); formerly huhole (Florio), hewcl (Marvell); in ME, hygh-whole (Halliwell), i. e. 'high-wheel'; all these forms being various twists given in popular speech to the name otherwise presented in hick-wall, hickway, q. v. The green woodpecker, Geococcyx viridis. [Prov. Eng.]

hewn (hūn). A past participle of hewl.

hexa-. [L. hexa-, repr. Gr. ἕξ, in comp. usually ἑξα-, in inscriptions also ἑξ-, ἑκ-, = L. sex = E. six, q. v.] An element of Greek origin or formation, meaning 'six.'

hexacapsular (hek-sa-kap'sū-lār), a. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + capsula + -ar.] In bot., having six capsules or seed-vessels: as, a hexacapsular plant.

hexace (hek'sā-sē), n. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + ἀκμή, a point.] A summit of a polyhedron formed by the concurrence of six faces.

Hexachetæ (hek-sā-kē'tē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + NL. cheta, q. v.] A division of the brachycerous Diptera, containing those two-winged flies which have a proboscis composed of six pieces, as the family Tabanidae: contrasted with Tetrachetæ and Dichetæ.

hexachatus (hek-sā-kē'tus), a. [As Hexachetæ + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hexachetæ.

hexachord (hek'sā-kōrd), n. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + χορδή, a string, cord, chord.] 1. In Gr. music: (a) A diatonic series of six tones. (b) The interval of a major sixth. (c) An instrument with six strings.—2. In medieval music, a diatonic series of six tones, containing four whole steps and one half-step (between the third and fourth tones). The hexachord was an attempt to improve on the ancient tetrachord as a unit of musical analysis. The entire series of recognized tones, from the second G below middle C to the second E above it, was distributed among seven hexachords, beginning on G, C, F, G, C, F, and G, respectively. Each hexachord was perfect in itself, and similar to every other; its tones were designated in order by the syllables ut, re, mi, fa, sol, and la. (See solmization.) Any given tone was designated both by its letter name and by its syllable name in full; middle C, for example, being known as C sol-fa-ut, etc. In actual singing the solmization and the singer's conception of the tones passed from one hexachord to another as far as necessary, the process of changing being called mutation. In contrapuntal writing the most perfect possible imitation was considered to be that which occurred between analogous tones of two hexachords. The hexachord system is doubtfully attributed to Guido d'Arezzo, in the eleventh century. It continued in use until, in the eighteenth century, the octave as a unit of analysis and the modern theory of key-relationship were recognized.

hexachronous (hek-sā-kō-nus), a. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + χρόνος, time.] In anc. pros., having a magnitude of six primary or fundamental times; hexasemic.

hexacolic (hek-sā-kol'ik), a. [Gr. ἑξάκολος, < ἕξ, = E. six, + κόλος, a member: see colon.] In anc. pros., consisting of six cola or series: as, a hexacolic period.

Hexacorallia (hek'sā-kō-rāl'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + κοράλλιον, coral.] One of the chief divisions of the Coralligena, in which the fundamental number of the intermesenteric chambers of the body-cavity, and likewise of the tentacles, is six; the hexamerous Coralligena, as distinguished from the Octocorallia, which are octomerous. The common Actinidae, or sea-anemones, are an example.

hexacoralan (hek'sā-kō-rāl'an), n. One of the Hexacorallia; a hexamerous coral.

hexacoraline (hek'sā-kō-rāl'in), a. and n. [Gr. ἑξάκορος + -ine.] 1. A. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hexacorallia.

II. n. One of the Hexacorallia; a hexacoralan.

hexact (hek'sakt'), a. Same as hexactinal.

hexactinal (hek-sak'ti-nal), a. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + ἀκτίς (aktis), a ray, + -al.] Having six rays, as a sponge-spicule.

hexactinellid (hek-sak-ti-nel'id), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hexactinellidae. Also hexactinelline.

II. n. One of the Hexactinellidae.

Hexactinellida (hek-sak-ti-nel'id-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hexactinella + -ida.] In Von Lendenfeld's system of classification, an order of silicious sponges, characterized by the triaxial and generally hexactinal spicules, in soft mesogloea, the supporting skeleton being often strengthened with silicious cement.

Hexactinellidæ (hek-sak-ti-nel'id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hexactinella (< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + ἀκτίς (aktis), a ray, + L. dim. -ella) + -idæ.] The glass-sponges rated as a family of silicious sponges.

hexactinelline (hek-sak-ti-nel'in), a. Same as hexactinellid.

Hexactiniæ (hek-sak-tin'id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + ἀκτίς (aktis), a ray.] A group of Actinaria with paired septa. The number of the pairs of septa is at least six, usually more, and in that case increasing in multiples of six. The mouth is fissure-shaped, and the esophagus has two esophageal grooves and two esophageal lappets.

hexad (hek'sad), n. [LL. hexas (hexad-), < Gr. ἑξάς (ἑξάς), the number six, < ἕξ = E. six.] 1. The sum of six units; the number six; also, a series of six numbers.—2. In chem., an element the atoms of which have six times the saturating power or equivalence of the hydrogen atom, as sulphur in certain conditions.

Also spelled hexade.

hexadactylism (hek-sa-dak'ti-lizm), n. [Gr. ἑξαδάκτυλος + -ism.] The condition of being hexadactylous.

hexadactylous (hek-sa-dak'ti-lus), a. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + δάκτυλος, a finger.] Having six fingers or toes.

hexade, n. See hexad.

hexadic (hek-sad'ik), a. [Gr. ἑξάς + -ic.] Pertaining to six as a base of numeration.

hexædron (hek-sā-ē'drōn), n. See hexahedron.

hexæmeron (hek-sā-em'e-rōn), n. [LL. hexæmeron, the six days of the creation, < LGr. ἑξαήμερος, the six days' work (the title of a book by Basil on the six days of the creation), prop. adj., or in six days, < Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + ἡμέρα, day.] 1. A term of six days.—2. A history of the six days' work of creation, as contained in the first chapter of Genesis.

The older account of the creation in Gen. ii. . . . does not recognize the hexæmeron, and it is even doubtful whether the original sketch of Gen. i. distributed creation over six days.

Encyc. Brit., XXI. 125.

The first volume is occupied with the Mosaic Hexæmeron and the Deluge.

Contemporary Rev., L. 752.

hexafoil (hek'sa-foil), a. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + E. foil, q. v.] Having six foils or lobes; six-lobed.

A vertical stem, rising from a wide hexafoil-shaped base. S. K. Cat. Spec. Ex., 1862, No. 1018.

hexagon (hek'sa-gōn), n. [L. hexagonum, < Gr. ἑξάγων, neut. of ἑξάγωνος, six-cornered, hexagonal, < ἕξ, = E. six, + γωνία, a corner, angle.] In geom., a figure of six sides and six angles. If it be plane and the sides and angles are equal, it is a regular hexagon.

hexagonal (hek-sag'ō-nal), a. [Gr. ἑξάγωνος + -al.] 1. Having six sides and six angles; having the form of a hexagon. The hexagonal system in crystallography includes such forms as the hexagonal prism, pyramid, etc., which are referred to three equal lateral axes inclined at angles of 60° and a vertical axis of different length at right angles to them. (See crystallography.) The rhombohedral system is a division of the hexagonal in which the forms are referred, sometimes to three equal inclined axes parallel to the faces of the fundamental rhombohedron, but more commonly to the same axes as the hexagonal forms; in the latter view the rhombohedron is regarded as the hemihedral form of a hexagonal pyramid, and similarly of the other forms. Hexagonal and rhombohedral forms have the same optical characters, both being uniaxial.

2. Divided into hexagons: as, a surface with a hexagonal structure.

hexagonally (hek-sag'ō-nal-i), adv. In the form of a hexagon.

hexagonienchymat (hek-sā-gō-ni-eng'ki-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑξάγωνος, six-cornered, hexagonal, + ἐγχυμα, an infusion: see enchymatous, and cf. parenchyma.] In bot., cellular tissue exhibiting hexagonal forms in section.

hexagonous (hek-sag'ō-nus), a. Same as hexagonal. [Rare.]

An hexagonous plate embossed with angles. Quar. Jour. of Geol. Soc., XLV. 172.

hexagonyl (hek-sag'ō-ni), n. [Directly < Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + γωνία, angle. Cf. hexagon.] A hexagon.

When I read in St. Ambrose of hexagonies, or sexangular cellars of bees, did I, therefore, conclude that they were mathematicians? A. B. Bramhall, Against Hobbes.

hexagram (hek'sa-gram), n. [Gr. ἑξάγραμμος, of six grams of weight, < ἕξ, = E. six, + γράμμα, a line, letter, etc.: see gram.] 1. A figure formed of two equilateral triangles placed concentrically with their sides parallel and on opposite sides of the center. This was the seal or symbol of the Pythagorean school.—2. In geom., a figure of six lines. The name is particularly applied to the mystic hexagram invented by Pascal.

Pascal's Hexagram. AB, BC, CD, DE, EF, FA are the successive lines. AB and DE intersect in G; BC and EF intersect in H; CD and FA intersect in I; G, H, and I are collinear.

the intersections of the first and fourth, the second and fifth, and the third and sixth lines lie on one straight line. This is a case of the elementary proposition that three cubic curves which have eight points in common also have a ninth in common. Brianchon's hexagram is circumscribed about a conic; and the chief property of it is that the three lines joining opposite angles intersect in one point.

3. In Chinese lit., one of the 64 figures which form the basis of the Yih-king or "book of changes," one of the oldest Chinese books. Each of these figures is made up of six parallel lines, of which some are whole and some divided. See book of changes, under change.

Hexagrammidæ (hek-sā-gram'id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hexagrammus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, represented by the genus Hexagrammus. It is characterized by enlarged suborbitals connected with the preoperculum, an elongated dorsal fin with its spinous and articulated portions subequal, an elongated anal fin, and perfect ventrals, each with a spine and five rays. The species are confined to the northern Pacific ocean, and are mostly found along the western coast of North America, especially California, where the typical species are improperly called rock-trout. The family is also called Chiridae, and by Günther Heterolepidæ.

Hexagrammus (hek-sā-gram'us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + γράμμα, a line.] The typical genus of Hexagrammidæ: so called from the six more or less developed lateral lines, three on each side, of which one is median, one dorsal, and one abdominal. Steller's rock-trout, H. asper, is an example.

hexagyn (hek'sā-jin), n. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + γυνή, female (in mod. bot. a pistil, style).] In the Linnean system, a plant having six styles.

Hexagynia (hek-sā-jin'id-ē), n. pl. [NL.: see hexagyn.] In the Linnean system, an order of plants, such as the sun-dew, having six styles.

hexagynian (hek-sā-jin'i-an), a. [As hexagyn + -ian.] In bot., having six styles.

hexagnous (hek-sā-jin'us), a. [As hexagyn + -ous.] Same as hexagynian.

hexahedral (hek-sā-hē'dral), a. [Gr. ἑξαεδρῶν + -al.] 1. Having the figure of a hexahedron; having six equal superficial sides or faces; cubic.—2. In entom., having six distinct and more or less parallel sides; six-sided: said of long bodies, as joints of the antennæ, etc.

hexahedron (hek-sā-hē'drōn), n. [Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + εἶδος, seat, base, = E. settle, n.] A solid body having six faces; especially, the regular hexahedron or cube. Also hexædron.

hexakisoctahedron (hek'sā-kis-ok-ta-hē'drōn), n. [Gr. ἑξάκις, six times (< ἕξ = E. six), or absence of other columns on the sides of the edifice, or at its opposite end, or within the portico. These characteristics must be expressed, in the description of a building, by the adjunction of other epithets or terms. Thus, the Roman temple called the Maison Carrée, at Nîmes, is a pseudo-hexastyle pseudo-peripteros; the Thesum at Athens is an amphiprostyle hexastyle peripteros temple, with pronaos and opisthodomos or epinuros, each with two columns in antis.

hexasyllabic

(hek'sa-si-lab'ik), a. [< L. hexasyllabus, < Gr. ἑξασύλλαβος, of six syllables, < ἕξ, = E. six, + σὺλ-λαβή, syllable; see syllable.] Containing or consisting of six syllables: as, irreconcilable is a hexasyllabic word; the hexasyllabic form of a choriambus (— — — — — for — — — — —).

hexatetrahedron (hek-sa-tet-ra-hē'dron), n.; pl. hexatetrahedra (-drā). [< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + E. tetrahedron, q. v.] In crystal, a solid bounded by twenty-four scalene triangles; the inclined hemihedral form of the hexoctahedron. The diamond sometimes has this form.

Hexateuch (hek'sa-tūk), n. [< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + τεύχος, a tool, implement, later also a book. Cf. Pentateuch, Heptateuch.] The first six books of the Old Testament. The sixth book, Joshua, relating the final settlement of the Jews in the promised land, is a continuation of the Pentateuch, and apparently forms with it a complete work, homogeneous in both style and purpose.

Having relegated the whole of the Hexateuch into a late period, Prof. Slade naturally finds no reliable historical record before the days of the Judges.

The Independent, Nov. 1, 1883.

Hexateuchal (hek'sa-tū-kal), a. [< Hexateuch + -al.] Of or pertaining to the Hexateuch.

hexatomic (hek-sa-tom'ik), a. [< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + ἄτομος, an atom.] In chem., consisting of six atoms: also applied to atoms which are hexavalent and to alcohols or other compounds having six replaceable hydrogen atoms.

hexavalent (hek-sav'a-lent), a. [< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + L. valen(-t)s, ppr. of valere, have power; see valid.] In chem., having the same saturating or combining power as six hydrogen atoms, or a valence of six.

hexaxon (hek-sak'son), a. [< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + ἄξων, an axle; see ax², axel², and axle.] Having six axes of growth, as a sponge-spicule.

hexicology (hek-si-kol'ō-jī), n. An erroneous form for hexiology.

hexiological (hek'si-ol'ō-jī-kal), a. [< hexiology + -ic-al.] Pertaining to hexiology.

hexiology (hek-si-ol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. ἕξ, a state or habit (< ἔχειν, have, hold; intr., be in a given state or condition; see hectic), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak; see -ology.] The history of the development and behavior of living beings as affected by their environment. This term was originally proposed by Mivart in the erroneous form hexeology.

hexiradiate (hek-si-rā'di-āt), a. [Irreg. < Gr. ἕξ, = L. sex = E. six, + L. radiatus, rayed; see radiate, a.] Having six rays, as the spicules of a glass-sponge; sexiradiate.

Hence the group is distinguished as hexiradiate.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 511.

hexoctahedron (hek-sok-ta-hē'dron), n. [< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + E. octahedron, q. v.] A crystalline form belonging to the isometric system and contained under forty-eight equal triangular faces. Also called adamantoid, because it is a common form of the diamond. Also hexakisoctahedron.

hexti, a. superl. [ME. hexte, hecst, etc., < AS. hēhsta, superl. of heah, high; see high. Cf. next, superl. of nigh.] Highest.

Hexoctahedron.

Than he glode thurgh the greues & the gray thornes,
To the hed of the hole on the hext gre [step].
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), 1. 13504.
The first apple and the hext
Which groweth vnto you next.
Ile of Ladies, 1. 345.

When bale is hext,
Boot is next. Old proverb.

hexyl (hek'sil), n. [< Gr. ἕξ, = E. six, + -yl.] The hypothetical radical (C₆H₁₃) of the sixth member of the monovalent series of alcohols.

hey¹ (hā), interj. [Also hay; < ME. hey, hay = D. hei = G. hei = Dan. Sw. hej, interj. Cf. heigh, ha!, ho!] An exclamation expressing pleasure, surprise, etc.: also used as a call to attract attention and as an interrogative.

Hey, Johnny Coup, are ye waking yet?
Ritson, Scottish Songs.

Well, and you were astonished at her beauty, hey?
Sheridan, The Duenna, ii. 3.

Bachelor Bluff, Bachelor Bluff,
Hey for a heart that's rugged and tough!
Old song, in Scott's Chronicles of the Canongate, xx.

hey², a. and adv. An obsolete form of high.
Chaucer.

hey³, v. and n. An obsolete form of hie. Chaucer.
hey⁴, n. An obsolete or rare form of hay².

heyday¹ (hā'dā), interj. [Formerly heyda, acc. of D. heidaar = G. heida = Dan. heida, hey there, ho there; see hey¹ and there.] An exclamation of cheerfulness, surprise, wonder, etc.

Hey-da! what Hans Fluterkin is this? what Dutchman does he build or frame castles in the air?
B. Jonson, Masque of Angurs.

Hey day! what's the matter now!
Sheridan, School for Scandal, v. 3.

heyday² (hā'dā), n. [Confused with heyday¹; prop. high-day, q. v.] Highest vigor; full strength; acme.

At your age,
The hey-day in the blood is tame, it's humble,
And waits upon the judgment.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4.

A merry peal puts my spirits quite in a hey-day.
Burton, Lord of the Manor, i. 1.

The natural association of the sentiment of love with the heyday of the blood seems to require that in order to portray it in vivid tints . . . one must not be too old.

Emerson, Love.
The heyday of life is over with him, but his old age is sunny and chirping.
Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 2.

heyday-guise¹, heydeguy¹ (hā'dā-gīz, hā'dē-gī), n. [Early mod. E. also haydeguy, haydeegee, as if sing., but usually heyday-guise, heydeguyes, heideguyes, hey-de-guize, hy-day-gies, hydagies, haydeguyes, etc., and prob. orig. hey-day guise, i. e. holiday fashion: see heyday² and guise.] A kind of dance; a country-dance or round.

But friendly Faeries, met with many Graces,
And light-foot Nymphs can chace the lingering Night
With heydeguyes and trimly trodden traces.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., June.

By wells and rills, in meadows greene,
We nightly dance our hey-day guize.
Robin Good-fellow (Percy's Reliques, p. 387).

Brave Don, cast your eyes
On our gipsy fashions;
In our antic hey-de-guize
We go beyond all nations.
Middleton, Spanish Gypsy, iv. 1.

heyet, v. and n. An obsolete variant of hie.
Chaucer.

height, a. and adv. An obsolete variant of high.
Chaucer.

hey-go-mad (hā'gō-mad). [< hey¹ + go + mad.] A colloquial expression implying an intense or extreme degree, boundlessness, absence of restraint, or the like. [Eng.]

Away they go, clattering like hey-go-mad.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, i. 2.

'Tisn't Mr. Bounderby, 'tis his wife; yo'r not fearfo' o' her; yo was hey-go-mad about her an hour sin.
Dickens, Hard Times, xxi.

hey-pass¹ (hā'pās'). [< hey, interj., + pass, impv.] An interjectional expression used by jugglers during the performance of their feats, and equivalent to "Presto, change!"

Ha' you forgotten me? you think to carry it away with your hey-passe and repasse.
Marlowe, Faustus, v. 1.

You wanted but Hey-passe to have made your transition like a mystical man of Sturbridge. But for all your sleight of hand, our just exceptions against liturgy are not vanished.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

heyront, n. An obsolete form of heron.

Hey's ligament. See ligament.

heysogot, heysugget, n. Obsolete forms of hay-suck.

Hg. In chem., the symbol for mercury (New Latin hydrargyrum).

H. H. An abbreviation of (a) His Holiness—that is, the Pope—or of (b) His (or Her) Highness.

hhd. A contraction of hogshhead.

hi (hi), interj. [Also hy; a mere exclamation, like hey¹, heigh, ha!, etc.] An exclamation of surprise, admiration, etc.: often used ironically and in derision.

Ready money worth twelve per cent. a month, too, and he with twelve banks in monte and fero. Hì, hì, hì!
J. W. Palmer, New and Old, p. 172.

Hiantes (hī-an'tēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. hian(-t)s, ppr. of hiare, gape; see hiatus.] 1. Same as Fissirostres. A. E. Brehm.—2. In Sundevall's classification of birds, a synonym of Amphigulares.

hiation (hī-ā'shon), n. [*< L. as if hiatio(n)-, < hiare, ppr. hiatus, gape; see hiatus.] The act of gaping.

The continual hiation or holding open of its [the chameleon's] mouth.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 21.

hiatus (hī-ā'tus), n.; pl. hiatuses, hiatus (-tus-ez, -tus). [L., a gap, aperture, chasm, hiatus, < hiare, ppr. hiatus, gape, yawn, allied to E. yawn, q. v.] 1. An opening; an aperture; a gap; a chasm.

Those hiatuses are at the bottom of the sea, whereby the abyss now opens into and communicates with it.
Woodward.

2. In anat., a foramen.—3. In gram. and pros., the coming together of two vowels without intervening consonant in successive words or syllables of one word.—4. A space from which something requisite to completeness is absent, as a missing link in a genealogy, an interval of unknown history, a lost or erased part of a manuscript, etc.; a lacuna; a break.

I shall endeavour to fill this hiatus by producing an almost entire chronologic series of paintings from the time to Hen. VII., when Mr. Vertue's notes recommence.
Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, l. ii.

A lamentable hiatus occurs in his greatest work.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 2.

Even the hiatus between the Vertebrata and the Invertebrata is partly, if not wholly, bridged over.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 50.

5. Specifically, in logic, a fault of demonstration, consisting in the omission to prove some premise made use of, and not self-evident or admitted.—Hiatus Fallopi, the opening of Fallopius, an aperture in the petrous portion of the temporal bone for the passage of the large superficial petrosal nerve.—Hiatus trapezii, the elongated lozenge-shaped interval between the fore border of the acromioclavicular muscle and the margins of the clavotrapezius muscle and the levator claviculae.

Hibbertia (hī-bēr'ti-ā), n. [NL. (Andrews, 1797), named after George Hibbert.] A genus of polypetalous dicotyledonous plants, belonging to the natural order Dilleniaceae and the tribe Hibbertieae. They are small heath-like shrubs with slender trailing or climbing stems, and showy yellow flowers in solitary terminal or axillary clusters. The flowers, which are strong-scented, have 5 thick sepals, Flowering Branch of Hibbertia volubilis.

5 fugacious petals, numerous stamens, and 1 to 15 carpels, each containing one or more shining seeds. About 70 species are known, chiefly confined to Australasia. They are the Australian rock-roses, and a number of species are cultivated for their showy flowers. Beautifully preserved impressions of the leaves of three species of this genus have been described by Conwentz from fragments of amber from the celebrated amber-beds of northern Prussia.

Hibbertieae (hī-bēr-ti-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hibbertia + -eae.] A tribe of polypetalous dicotyledonous plants, of the natural order Dilleniaceae, proposed by Reichenbach in 1828, and typified by the genus Hibbertia. It differs from the other tribes of the Dilleniaceae by having the apex of the filaments never or rarely dilated, by the anthers being often oblong, and by having small one-nerved or rarely reticulate-nerved leaves. Same as Hibbertineae of Spach.

hibernacle (hī-bēr-nā-kl), n. [= F. hibernacle, the bud in which the embryo of a plant is inclosed, = Sp. invernaculo, a greenhouse, < L. hibernaculum, winter residence, pl. hibernacula, winter tents, winter quarters, pl. hibernare, pass the winter: see hibernate.] 1. That which serves for shelter or protection in winter; winter quarters.—2. In hort., a covering or protection for young buds during winter.—3. Same as hibernaculum, 2.

hibernaculum (hi-bér-nák'-ū-lum), n.; pl. hibernacula (-lā). [L.: see hibernacle.] 1. Same as hibernacle, 1.

As a neighbour was lately ploughing in a dry chalky field far removed from any water, he turned out a water-rat that was curiously laid up in an hibernaculum artificially formed of grass and leaves.

Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, xxviii.

There sat a frog . . . in a little excavation in the surface of the leaf-mould. As it sat there, the top of its back was level with the surface of the ground. This, then, was its hibernaculum; here it was prepared to pass the winter.

J. Burroughs, Signs and Seasons, p. 16.

2. In bot., any part of a plant which protects an embryonic organ during the winter, as a bud or bulb. Also hibernacle. [Now rare.]—3. In zool.: (a) One of the winter buds of a polyzoan; an arrested and encysted polyzoan-bud capable of surviving the winter and germinating in the following spring.

The only approach to a differentiation of the polyptides in Paludicella is in the arrest of growth of some of the buds of a colony in autumn, which, instead of advancing to maturity, become conical and invested with a dark-colored cuticle. They are termed hibernacula.

E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 433.

(b) The false opercule or pseudoperculum of a snail.

It is not uncommon thing to find, during the warm season, individuals (snails) to the exterior of whose shells there adhere one or more (often a great number) of . . . hibernacula, cast off by their fellows on emerging from the dormant state.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 273.

hibernal (hi-bér-nal), a. [= F. hibernal, hibernal = Sp. Pg. invernale, < L. hibernalis, < hibernus, of winter: see hibernate.] Belonging or relating to winter; wintry.

Pg. invernar* = Pr. vernar = F. hiverner), pass the winter, < hibernus, of or belonging to winter, wintry (> It. inverno, verno = Sp. invierno = Pg. inverno = Pr. ivern = F. hivier, winter), prob. orig. himernus* (= Gr. χειμερινός, of or belonging to winter, wintry), < hiems, winter: see hiems.] 1. To winter; pass the season of winter in close quarters or in seclusion, and generally in a torpid condition, as some animals.

Other causes than cold may induce an animal to hibernate; as when deprived of the supply of food gathered during the previous season.

Science, III. 533.

2. Figuratively, to remain in seclusion; pass the time torpidly or apathetically.

I want to hibernate for three months, and not see a soul, except you with my meals. T. Winthrop, Cecil Dreeme, vi.

hibernation (hi-bér-nā'-shon), n. [Formerly also hybernation; = F. hibernation, hybernation, < L. as if hibernatio* (> n.), < hibernare, hibernate: see hibernate, v.] The act or period of hibernating.

The several plants that were to pass their hibernation in the green-house.

Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, A New Conservatory.

Naturalists have not sufficiently discriminated between torpidity and hibernation.

E. Blyth, Note on Gilbert White's Nat. Hist. of Selborne, xxviii.

Hibernian (hi-bér-ni-an), a. and n. [L. Hibernia, sometimes written Iverna, Juverna, also Ierna, Ierne, Gr. Ἰουερνία, Ἰέρων, regarded as various forms of the name which appears later as Ir. Erin, gen. Erinn, Erin, Ireland.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Hibernia, now Ireland, or to its inhabitants; characteristic of Ireland or the Irish; Irish.

Hibernian politics, O Swift! thy fate.

Pope, Dunciad, III. 331.
